If those voting on the question and those who are present and decline to vote shall together make a majority of the House, the Speaker shall declare that a quorum is constituted, and the pending question shall be decided as the majority of those voting shall appear. And thereupon further proceedings under the call shall be considered as dispensed with. At any time after the roll call has been completed, the Speaker may entertain a motion to adjourn, if seconded by a majority of those present, to be ascertained by actual count by the Speaker; and if the House adjourns, all proceedings under this section shall be vacated. But this section of the rule shall not apply to the sessions of Friday night, until further order of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Under that rule it is the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to begin the arrest of members and bring them in. I would like to inquire if the Sergeant-at-Arms is discharging his duty.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is so informed. The Chair is of opinion that the Sergeant-at-Arms has just as much authority under this rule as he would have under the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I concede that, if the Sergeant-at-Arms is discharging his duty.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is advised that he is now in the performance of his duty.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The assurance of the Speaker is sufficient.

Pending the announcement of the call, the following occurred:

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. A number of members have voted since the count was announced. May we not be told how many we lack of a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there is no objection, the Chair will state. The Clerk reports 56 members lacking to constitute a quorum.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. May I ask as a parliamentary inquiry what number the Chair holds necessary to constitute a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and seventy-eight at the present time, the Chair is informed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I only want to remark that it is very curious, with a majority of 45 in the House, that the Republican party can not furnish a quorum to transact business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If it was to remit tariff duties on tea and one thing and another, it would be all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is it out of order to discuss the present situation?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman may discuss any matter in relation to the attendance of a quorum.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, that is what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] wanted to do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course the Chair would say that it would be necessary to have some proposition pending before any debate would be in order.

Mr. GRAFF. It is the absence of members.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think it is in order to discuss the present situation and to inquire how it has come about, and to express our wonder at the general curiousness of the situation. It seems to me it is absolutely in order to express our wonder at the fact that the Republican party, which is the party to do business always, is without a quorum in a House in which it has some forty or fifty majority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, that was all a part of my parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Would it be in order to appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. I presume an appeal would lie.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I withdraw the appeal. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What I desire to know, Mr. Speaker, is how it is, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and two, we have the Republican party—— [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is always a year behind. [Laughter.]

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly (at 8 o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until Saturday, January 31, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House, at 10.30 o'clock a. m. Saturday, January 31, 1903, was called to order by Mr. DALZELL as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first bill in order from the Committee of the Whole.

ELEONORA G. GOLDSBOROUGH.

The first business was the bill (S. 3421) for the relief of Eleonora G. Goldsborough, reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] that as to that bill and a number of others it will be necessary to have a quorum before they can be passed. I suggest to him that the bill be passed over without prejudice, so that the others on the list may be disposed of.

Mr. GRAFF. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that that will not prejudice the status of the claim or its consideration, except as to the order of its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to pass without prejudice the pending bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

A bill (H. R. 13534) granting an increase of pension to James Evans: and

A bill (H. R. 15840) granting an increase of pension to Rudolph B. Weyeneth.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6941) granting a pension to James Monty, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 15659) granting a pension to Elise Sigel;

A bill (H. R. 16161) granting an increase of pension to Francis A. Tradewell; and

A bill (S. 4287) granting an increase of pension to David N. Tolles.

Mr. BURNHAM, from the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 14th instant proposing to appropriate $40,000 to enable the inhabitants of the district of Alaska to provide and maintain an exhibit of the products and resources of that district at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition in the city of St. Louis, Mo., intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

STATEHOOD AMENDMENTS.

Mr. QUAY. I am directed by the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by me on the 28th instant, proposing statehood to the Territories of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico, intended to be proposed to the Agricultural appropriation bill, to report it with an amendment. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, before the reference is made, I ask that the amendment may lie over for a day under section 2 of Rule XXVI.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think that the rule applies to simply an amendment reported.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I call the attention of the Chair to the second clause of Rule XXVI:

All reports of committees and motions to discharge a committee from the consideration of the subject, and all subjects from which a committee shall be discharged, shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think that this——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I do not think the amendment comes under the provision of the rule.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. "All reports of committees."

Mr. BLACKBURN. Well, let the rule be read.

Mr. BEVERIDGE (reading):

All reports of committees and motions to discharge a committee from the consideration of the subject, and all subjects from which a committee shall be discharged, shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am quite sure that if the view shall be taken that an amendment reported from a committee, to be offered to an appropriation bill, is to lie over upon objection, without a direct reference to the committee that has charge of that general appropriation bill, it is the establishment of a new precedent in the experience of the Senate. I know of no instance in which such a proposed amendment to a general appropriation bill has ever failed to be referred directly to the committee having charge of that appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair knows of no such instance, but is inclined to think that the rule is broad enough to apply to it if objection is made. The Chair never knew the objection to be made.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me that the rule is very broad. It says "all subjects" with which a committee is charged. Now, this is a subject with which a committee is charged, and it seems to me that if the objection is made it falls within the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will so hold.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It says "all reports of committees."

Mr. QUAY. What is the ruling?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The ruling is that the amendment lies over for one day.

Mr. QUAY. That is, that every report of this character must go over for one day unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so holds.

Mr. QUAY. It is a matter of no consequence. I merely wished to know the ruling.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so holds.

Mr. HOAR. Let the rule to which attention was called, the second clause of Rule XXVI, be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for the reading of the clause of the rule relating to this subject. It will be read.

The Secretary read from the Senate Manual, page 25, Rule XXVI, clause 2, as follows:

All reports of committees and motions to discharge a committee from the consideration of the subject, and all subjects from which a committee shall be discharged, shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

Mr. QUAY. I am also directed by the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by me on the 28th instant proposing statehood to the Territories of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, to report it with an amendment. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not hear what the report is.

Mr. QUAY. It is the same report except it goes to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I make the same request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania reports favorably from the Committee on the Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let it lie over a day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A certain amendment favorably, and asks its reference to the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana objects to the present reference, and the amendment goes over under the rule.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 7216) granting an increase of pension to John Weaver; and

A bill (S. 7217) granting a pension to Fidelia Sellers.

Mr. WELLINGTON introduced a bill (S. 7218) granting an increase of pension to Selah V. Reeve; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 7219) granting an increase of pension to Ira G. Phillips; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 161) proposing an amendment to the Constitution to limit fortunes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,500 for grading and macadamizing Woodley road, between Wisconsin avenue and Idaho avenue, and $10,000 for grading and improving Wisconsin avenue, between Thirty-seventh street and Massachusetts avenue, in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk at an annual salary of $1,200, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

CALENDAR OF RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HOAR. I submit a resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Ordered, That in making up the Calendar of Business, resolutions coming over from a previous day entitled under the rules to be laid before the Senate as a part of the morning business shall be included in the order in which they are so entitled.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it will be a great convenience, I think, to all Senators to know from the Calendar when a resolution which comes over from a previous day is expected to come up.

I will modify the resolution, and instead of saying "as a part of the morning business," I will say "at the close of the morning business." That is the phrase which the Chair commonly uses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified. The Chair desires to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the resolution does not involve a change in the rules or a new rule, which would require one day's notice before receiving consideration?

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that a direction to the officer who makes up the Calendar is a rule. I think such directions have been given frequently by an ordinary resolution of the Senate. I suppose a rule is an order for the conduct of the business of the Senate, and not merely a direction that something shall be printed for its information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair accepts the judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

STEAMERS W. L. EWING AND LOUISVILLE.

Mr. FORAKER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a statement of claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury in settlements 5201, of 1885, and 5303, of 1885, named in House Executive Document No. 153, Forty-eighth Congress, second session, said claims having been made by certain marine-insurance companies of Cincinnati, Ohio, and St. Louis, Mo., being for insurance paid by them to the owners of the steamers W. L. Ewing and Louisville, said vessels having been destroyed while in the employ of the United States Government, and the amount of insurance paid by said companies, respectively, having been deducted from the value of the vessels as determined and paid by the United States to the owners thereof, and the amount of said insurance being still retained in the possession of the United States.

COURTS-MARTIAL IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, it is desirable that we should have an executive session to-day, and as after 2 o'clock other business will intervene——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Illinois suspend for one moment? Perhaps it may be desired to have a resolution coming over from a previous day retain its place, or something of that kind.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Illinois will withdraw his motion for one moment——

Mr. CULLOM. I will.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 348, by Mr. RAWLINS, calling on the Secretary of War to inform the Senate what courts-martial have been ordered and held in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I had intended this morning to make a few remarks on the resolution, but I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Illinois, and if it can retain its place on the table where it now stands, I will ask that that course be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the resolution may retain its place on the table. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

CONFEDERATE MOUND, OAK WOODS CEMETERY, CHICAGO.

Mr. ALGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 9360.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ALGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9360) for the improvement and care of Confederate Mound in Oak Woods Cemetery, Chicago, Ill., and making an appropriation therefor.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Secretary of War to enter into a contract with the Oak Woods Cemetery Association for the improvement and ornamentation of the plat of ground owned by the United States and known as "Confederate Mound," located in Oak Woods Cemetery, Chicago, Ill., in which are buried 12 Union and 4,039 Confederate soldiers, who died at Camp Douglas during the war of the rebellion, so as to bring the condition of the plat of ground up to the standard of the improvements in the cemetery surrounding it. To defray the expenses of the improvement provided for in section 1 of the act $3,850 is appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to state——

Mr. MCCOMAS. I ask the Senator to let me put a question to him before he makes his motion. I apprehend the Senator from Illinois does not mean by an executive session to interfere with the special order at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. I was about to state, without the interrogatory being put to me, that the only purpose I have will be disposed of in a very few minutes. So far as I am concerned, I desire an executive session for a very few minutes for a special purpose. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

WEDEN O'NEAL.

Mr. DEBOE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12316) granting an increase of pension to Weden O'Neal.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Weden O'Neal, late colonel Fifty-fifth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN INDIANA.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6147) to establish a fish-hatching and fish station in the State of Indiana.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Indiana, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable point to be selected by the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OVERTIME CLAIMS OF LETTER CARRIERS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2429) to provide for the payment of overtime claims of letter carriers excluded from judgment as barred by limitation.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 11, after the words "two hundred and eighty-two thousand," to strike out "eight hundred and forty-four dollars and ninety-six," and insert "nine hundred and forty-three dollars and eighty-eight;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the several parties named in Senate Document No. 216, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, and Senate Document No. 158, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, or their legal representatives, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amounts set opposite each of their names, respectively, aggregating $282,943.88, representing services actually performed by them as letter carriers in excess of eight hours per day and reported by commissioners of the Court of Claims as being the amounts due them under the provisions of the act of May 24, 1888, entitled "An act to limit the hours that letter carriers in cities shall be employed per day," but which have been excluded or excepted from judgment for the sole reason that the same were barred by the statute of limitations.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. By what committee has this bill been reported?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WARREN. I will say, Mr. President, that a bill similar in terms to this has been recommended by Postmasters-General W. S. Bissell and Charles Emory Smith, also by Attorney-General John W. Griggs. This bill is for the payment of the amount found due by commissioners of the Court of Claims.

The Postmaster-General, in the earlier stages of the controversy, assured the letter carriers that it was not necessary to go to the Court of Claims, but that they would be taken care of by the Department. Congress, however, did not make the necessary appropriation, and the statute of limitations intervened. This bill is to correct that difficulty and to pay the amount found due by the commissioners of the Court of Claims.

The report accompanying the bill is very full, and the case a complete and deserving one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Claims, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF PERSONS ACCUSED OF CRIME.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 7124) to provide for the removal of persons accused of crime to and from the Philippine Islands, Guam, Tutuila, and Manua for trial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 1014 of the Revised Statutes, so far as applicable, shall apply throughout the United States for the arrest and removal therefrom to the Philippine Islands, Guam, Tutuila, or Manua of any fugitive from justice charged with the commission of any crime or offense against the United States within the Philippine Islands, Guam, Tutuila, or Manua, and shall apply within the Philippine Islands, Guam, Tutuila, or Manua for the arrest and removal therefrom to the United States of any fugitive from justice charged with the commission of any crime or offense against the United States. Such fugitive may, by any judge or magistrate of the Philippine Islands, Guam, Tutuila, or Manua, and agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders therein, be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, pending the issuance of a warrant for his removal to the United States, which warrant it shall be the duty of a judge of the court of first instance seasonably to issue, and of the officer or agent of the United States designated for the purpose to execute. Such officer or agent, when engaged in executing such warrant without the Philippine Islands, Guam, Tutuila, or Manua, shall have all the powers of a marshal of the United States so far as such powers are requisite for the prisoner's safe-keeping and the execution of the warrant.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of sections 5278 and 5279 of the Revised Statutes, so far as applicable, shall apply to the Philippine Islands, Guam, Tutuila, or Manua, which, for the purposes of said sections, shall be deemed a Territory within the meaning thereof.

Mr. LODGE. I move to amend——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent has not yet been given for the consideration of the bill. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to reserve the right to object.

Mr. LODGE. If the bill is going to give rise to debate, I will withdraw it; but I should like to be allowed to make a single statement.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was merely going to ask a question for information.

Mr. LODGE. I think if the Senator will allow me to make a brief statement it will probably meet any objection he may have to the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. There is now no means of getting an offender against the laws of the United States from the Philippines, Guam, Tutuila, or Manua. This bill provides means for getting offenders against the laws of the United States or against the laws of any State or Territory who take refuge in those islands in the same way as offenders against their laws can be extradited from this country to those islands. As it is now those islands are simply a refuge for fugitives from justice. Of course we can have no extradition treaties with them, and we have no law extending to them enabling us to get a fugitive from justice, as we have a law enabling us to get a fugitive from justice in a State or Territory in the Union.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask my colleague a question, and I should like to reserve the right to object to the bill, if I may, until I can have an opportunity to ask the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. What I want to know is, what is the government, what are the courts, and what are the trials in Guam, in these other islands, and in the Philippine Islands?

I will say to my colleague, before he answers the question, that I understand there is practically no government whatever in Guam—I understand from the message of the President that that is the case—except that the Secretary of the Navy has arbitrary power there under the war power as the representative of the Chief Executive, and that under Executive direction the Secretary of the Navy has instituted a government there.

I inquire whether it would not practically answer my colleague's purpose to confine this legislation to the Philippine Islands alone, rather than to go into the matter of whether the United States citizens have proper security against being sent out there from their homes on the mere requisition of a naval lieutenant.

I wish to say that we made a very careful provision regarding this matter in respect to Cuba, and there can be no objection that I can see to extending the same provision to the Philippine Islands, but under the provisions of the bill as it now stands I should not like to incur the risk of having myself or my colleague liable legally to be seized in our houses and taken out to Guam on the requisition of a naval lieutenant, and that is what this bill as it now stands would permit, I am afraid.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think we could be taken out on the requisition of a lieutenant, because there are regularly established courts in those islands.

Mr. HOAR. What are they?

Mr. LODGE. They were established under an order of the Department. They are regularly organized courts with a chief justice, an attorney-general, and regular law officers who are now serving under the Government of the United States, having been appointed under the authority of the Navy Department, that being the only way in which they could be appointed.

My interest of course is greater in the Philippines than in these other islands, but I think it would be very unfortunate to make the other islands places where fugitives from justice would be likely to seek refuge; and I should think it desirable that there should be some way of getting back for trial any American citizens who happened to be in those islands and who committed crimes there.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, we have always guarded with great care the deportation of American citizens from one State to another, and the executive authorities of all the States have exercised a certain discretion which has sometimes seemed to be perhaps opposed to the letter of the law. I think there was some such case in the State of Indiana, where the governor refused to recognize a request for extradition from Kentucky.

The two Houses had this matter in regard to Cuba under consideration and they required that before American citizens should be taken to Cuba, which was in possession of the United States authorities, there should be security that the person accused should have a trial where the customary constitutional safeguards were substantially preserved.

In the island of Guam I understand there are nine or ten thousand natives, or thereabouts, and the judicial authority in existence there, as I understand from the statement of my colleague, is one appointed by the Secretary of the Navy. Of course the Secretary of the Navy would be responsible for the proper administration of the law there, and if any man in the world could be safely intrusted with such authority, the present Secretary of the Navy is the man, as we all know, and, of course, the ultimate responsibility will rest with him.

I should like to have this bill go over, unless my colleague will consent to confine its operations to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing, Mr. President, to strike out the words "Guam, Tutuila, or Manua," wherever they occur in the bill, if that will hasten action, but I think it would be a great pity to do so. I am, however, so anxious to get this bill through that I will consent to that amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. I rise to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico have reported favorably two bills, one providing a civil government for Guam, and the other a civil government for Tutuila.

Mr. LODGE. I was aware of that.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the proper provision to cover the cases of these other islands be put in those bills.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

Mr. FORAKER. I will do that if that will be agreeable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "Guam, Tutuila, or Manua," wherever they occur, so as to confine it to the Philippine Islands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the removal of persons accused of crime to and from the Philippine Islands."

PORT OF DELIVERY AT SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

Mr. KEARNS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 7168) to establish a port of delivery at Salt Lake City, Utah.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15449) to increase the efficiency of the Army. It will only take a few moments.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, in section 3, line 22, after the word "officer," to strike out "except a general officer;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the general staff corps shall consist of 1 chief of staff and 2 general officers, all to be detailed by the President from officers of the Army at large not below the grade of brigadier-general; 4 colonels, 6 lieutenant-colonels, and 12 majors, to be detailed from the corresponding grades in the Army at large, under such rules for selection as the President may prescribe; 20 captains, to be detailed from officers of the Army at large of the grades of captain or first lieutenant, who while so serving shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of captain mounted. All officers detailed in the general staff corps shall be detailed therein for periods of four years, unless sooner relieved. While serving in the general staff corps officers may be temporarily assigned to duty with any branch of the Army. Upon being relieved from duty in the general staff corps, officers shall return to the branch of the Army in which they hold permanent commission, and no officer shall be eligible to a further detail in the general staff corps until he shall have served two years with the branch of the Army in which commissioned, except in case of emergency in time of war.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, in section 4, line 4, after the word "President," to insert "or the Secretary of War;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the chief of staff, under the direction of the President or the Secretary of War, shall have supervision of all troops of the line and of the Adjutant-General's, Inspector-General's, Judge-Advocate's, Quartermaster's, Subsistence, Medical, Pay, and Ordnance departments, the Corps of Engineers, and the Signal Corps, and shall perform such other military duties not otherwise assigned by law as may be assigned to him by the President. Duties now prescribed by statute for the Commanding General of the Army as a member of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification and of the Board of Commissioners of the Soldiers' Home shall be performed by the chief of staff or other officer designated by the President. Acts and parts of acts authorizing aids-de-camp and military secretaries shall not apply to general officers of the general staff corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of the bill, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 5. That the Chief of Artillery shall hereafter serve as an additional member of the general staff and shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier-general.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. By instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I offer an amendment to come in at the end of section 5, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 5 it is proposed to insert:

And the provisions of the foregoing sections of this act shall take effect August 15, 1903.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORAKER. By instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. 6. That any officer of the Army now on the active list below the grade of major-general who served with credit as an officer or an enlisted man in the regular or volunteer service during the civil war before April 9, 1865, shall, when retired, be retired by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with the rank and pay of the next higher grade. This section shall apply to officers who have been retired on or since the 11th day of August, 1898, but shall not apply to any officer whose service on the active list does not exceed 35 years, and shall not apply to any officer who has been placed on the retired list by virtue of any act of Congress, nor to any officer who has already received an advance of grade at the time of retirement, or with a view to retirement.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Ohio—I do not know but it is a mere caviling question—whether the amendment should not read:

Any officer who has been placed on the retired list by virtue of any special act of Congress, etc.

Mr. FORAKER. I agree to that modification of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio modifies his amendment by inserting in line 13 thereof, before the words "act of Congress," the word "special." The question is on the amendment, as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BERRY subsequently said: I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed a few moments ago the bill (H. R. 15449) "to increase the efficiency of the Army." I think it is the general staff bill. I wish to enter the motion to reconsider. I do not wish to take it up now.

Mr. BATE. I wish to make a motion in regard to the bill to which the Senator from Arkansas has entered a motion to reconsider. I think, inasmuch as the motion has been entered to reconsider the bill known as the staff bill, it had better be reprinted; and I move that it be reprinted and distributed to Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Army bill which was passed a short time ago, and in relation to which the Senator from Arkansas has entered a motion to reconsider, be reprinted.

Mr. BATE. As it now is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As it now is.

Mr. BATE. With the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

HEIRS OF MARY AND FRANCIS OR JENNY CLARK.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8238) for the relief of the heirs of Mary Clark and Francis or Jenny Clark, deceased, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent in fee simple to the heirs of Mary Clark and Francis or Jenny Clark, deceased, late of Oklahoma Territory, for the northwest quarter of section 17 in township 13 north, of range 8 west, of the Indian meridian, in that Territory, and the northeast quarter of section 26 in township 11 north, of range 8 west, of the Indian meridian, the patent to issue in lieu of a patent issued to Francis or Jenny Clark May 20, 1892, for the first-described tract, and a patent issued to Mary Clark on the 6th of May, 1892, for the last-described tract; each of the patents being trust in their character and issued under the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 8, 1887, as amended by the act of March 3, 1891, the allottees being members of the Cheyenne or Arapahoe tribe of Indians; and the lands when so patented shall be subject to taxation under the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma.

FOREST LIEN LAND SELECTIONS IN MONTANA.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6339) to confirm certain forest lien selections made under the act approved June 4, 1897. (30 Stats., 36.)

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that all bona fide selections under the act approved June 4, 1897 (30 Stats., 36), of lands in Montana which lie within the territory opened to entry under the provisions of the act approved May 1, 1888, chapter 213, 25 Statutes, 113 to 133, entitled "An act to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Gros Ventre, Piegan, Blood, Blackfeet, and River Crow Indians in Montana, and for other purposes," made prior to the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office dated October 20, 1902, in the case of George L. Ramsey, holding that such lands are subject to disposal only under the forms of entry provided by the act of May 1, 1888, shall be confirmed, no other valid objection to the acceptance of such selections appearing.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6515) to exempt from taxation certain property of the Daughters of the American Revolution in Washington, D. C. There will be no objection to it, I think.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the property situated in square No. 173, in Washington City, D. C., occupied by the Daughters of the American Revolution, be exempted from all taxation so long as the same is so occupied and used, subject to the provisions of section 8 of the act approved March 3, 1877, providing for exemptions of church and school property, and acts amendatory thereof.

Shufeldt, United States Navy, in negotiating the treaty between the United States and Korea, and for services rendered and expenses incurred by her while acting as his secretary during the negotiations of the said treaty and other diplomatic duties performed by her father for the United States, for which she has never received compensation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I regret, Mr. President, that I can not accede to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. CLAY. I ask that the bill (S. 6056) to pay Hewlette A. Hall balance due for services in connection with the Paris Exposition be put upon its passage.

McLelland, deceased, late of Cobb County, Ga., $5,500 for cotton taken by or furnished to the military forces of the United States for hospital purposes during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is there a report with the bill? If there is, I should like to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut that the bill has been carefully considered by the House; the amount cut down. It has unanimously passed through the committee and the House.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What were the circumstances under which the cotton was taken?

Mr. DUBOIS. Either the Senator from Iowa or I can explain it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to hear some explanation.

Mr. DOLLIVER. This is a claim for cotton taken by the Federal troops shortly after the battle of Kenesaw Mountain, from a loyal citizen, for use in the hospitals which were set up on the field after that battle. The bill has passed the House of Representatives repeatedly, and comes here now unanimously reported by the Committee on Claims. It is a very just bill, I think.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGES.

Mr. ELKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6950) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio River, and to prescribe the dimensions of the same," approved December 17, 1872, and an act supplementary thereto, approved February 14, 1883. It has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Commerce, with an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I will be very glad if the Senator from West Virginia will allow this bill to go over until Monday, when my colleague will be present. I think possibly at that time there will be no objection to the bill, but I am not certain. It covers the bridges on the Monongahela River in the vicinity of Pittsburg, as I understand.

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir; from Pittsburg up.

Mr. QUAY. I would not agree, as it involves Pennsylvania bridges, to permit it to pass at present. It was brought to my attention only this morning by the secretary of my colleague, who said my colleague was absent and desired that I should mention his wishes in the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

Mr. QUAY. I do not object especially, except for the reason stated.

WILLIAM P. TAYLOR.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4876) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William P. Taylor, deceased.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William P. Taylor, late of Company C, Thirty-ninth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and Company A, Fortieth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and to grant him an honorable discharge of date February 7, 1863.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if the bill contains the usual provision of such bills in respect to allowances for pension, and all that?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know.

Mr. FORAKER. What is the inquiry?

Mr. SPOONER. Ordinarily it is provided in such bills that——

Mr. COCKRELL. No pay, bounty, or other allowance shall accrue.

Mr. SPOONER. That no pay, bounty, or other allowance shall accrue, or a pension.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill be read again, so that I may see whether it contains the provision referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FORAKER. No, it does not contain such a provision.

The Secretary again read the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be amended by inserting the usual words:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other allowance shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. FORAKER. There is no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CORRECTION OF MILITARY RECORDS.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I presume that the bill which has just passed is all right, but we have a great many of these bills correcting records and granting honorable discharges, and I wish to inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether it is not possible to make some amendment in our laws regulating and governing this matter, so as to relieve Congress from the necessity of considering these special cases. I suppose these special cases all come under some general principle, about which provision might be made. I do not know whether it is possible safely to change our laws so as to liberalize them in this respect, but surely, if there are so many cases in which relief ought to be granted by special acts, it seems to me there might be a bill brought in which would relieve the Military Committee and Congress from the necessity of considering these special cases. I should like the Senator's idea upon that point.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will say, in explanation, that we have passed a general law, and that general law is just as liberal as the Committee on Military Affairs for years back has deemed it prudent and wise to go. We have authorized the War Department to remove the charges in cases, for example, where a man leaves one company without leave, is marked a deserter, and goes and joins another. If he does that within four months, one hundred and twenty days, the War Department relieves him. But suppose he did not do it until four months and one day or two days. Then the War Department can not relieve him.

Then, again, the War Department is authorized to remove charges of desertion where the man was absent and sick, and unable to return and rejoin his command until it was mustered out. Then it is a question of the competency of the evidence offered to establish the fact of his disability.

We think we have gone just as far as we properly can in the way of general legislation. We have guarded all bills so that there is no opportunity to get arrears of pay or anything of the kind.

There have been a number of bills to extend the laws, but if you extend them much further you open a wider door than exists now.

OKLAHOMA CITY AND WESTERN RAILROAD.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 9503) to authorize the Oklahoma and Western Railroad Company to construct and operate a railway through the Fort Sill Military Reservation, and for other purposes. It is a very short bill and quite an important one. It has the approval of the Secretary of War, and has passed the House. There are some amendments.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The amendments were, in section 2, page 2, line 15, after the words "Provided further," to strike out:

That the said right of way shall be parallel with and contiguous to the right of way granted to the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad by the act of Congress approved January 31, 1900; that

And insert the word "That;" in line 20, after the word "Oklahoma," insert the word "City;" in line 23, after the word "Oklahoma," to insert the word "City;" on page 3, line 4, after the word "Oklahoma," to insert the word "City;" on page 3, line 6, after the word "Railroad," to strike out "and distant not more than half a mile from the flagstaff at Fort Sill;" in line 8, after the word "Oklahoma," to insert the word "City;" in line 9, after the word "and," to strike out "will construct and maintain a side track from their station to the quartermaster and commissary storehouses at Fort Sill; that the Oklahoma and Western Railroad Company;" in line 16, after the word "Oklahoma," to insert "City;" and in line 18, after the words "Secretary of War," to strike out:

And provided further, That this act shall not be considered to grant any title to the lands selected for such right of way, but that the right to take and use such lands for said purpose shall be revocable at will by the Secretary of War.

So as to read:

That no more space on the military reservation be given to the said Oklahoma City and Western Railroad Company than was given to the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad under the terms of the act of January 31, 1900; that the Oklahoma City and Western Railroad Company will fence its right of way and lay and maintain sufficient fence equal to that built by the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad and will provide and maintain suitable crossings opposite those already provided by the said Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad; that the said Oklahoma City and Western Railroad Company will build and maintain a suitable station house near the station of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad; that the Oklahoma City and Western Railroad Company will provide suitable and sufficient side track at their station and will construct and maintain sufficient stock pens and provide sufficient facilities for loading and unloading cattle and horses on the ground set apart for their station: Provided further, That the said Oklahoma City and Western Railroad Company shall comply with such other regulations or conditions as may from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Oklahoma City and Western Railroad Company to construct and operate a railway through the Fort Sill Military Reservation, and for other purposes."

WATER SUPPLY OF BATESVILLE, ARK.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6754) authorizing the city of Batesville, Ark., to draw water from the pool of Dam No. 1, Upper White River.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6290) to extend the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by act of February 26, 1895, relating to public lands.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where any of the public lands of the United States are now open, or shall hereafter be opened to actual settlers only, under the provisions of the homestead law and under the law relating to town sites, and for that reason section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by act of February 26, 1895, relating to the sale of isolated or disconnected tracts or parcels, is not applicable from and after the passage and approval of this act, a sale under the last-named section as so amended of any isolated or disconnected tracts or parcels may be ordered by the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided, however, That the minimum price for which such tracts or parcels shall be sold shall be the price required by the act under which the land so sold is subject to entry: And provided further, That where no price is provided in the act opening the said lands then the price for which said lands shall be sold shall be not less than $1.25 per acre.

Mr. DUBOIS. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. DUBOIS. I should like to hear the report read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GAMBLE December 10, 1902, as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6290) to extend the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by act of February 26, 1895, relating to public lands, having had the same under consideration, make the following report and recommend that the bill do pass:

The purpose of this bill is to extend the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes. The foregoing section as amended by the act of February 26, 1895, is as follows:

"SEC. 2455. It shall be lawful for the Commissioner of the General Land Office to order into market and sell for not less than $1.25 per acre any isolated or disconnected tract or parcel of the public domain less than one-quarter section, which in his judgment it would be proper to expose to sale after at least thirty days' notice by the land officers of the district in which such lands may be situated: Provided, That lands shall not become so isolated or disconnected until the same have been subject to homestead entry for a period of three years after the surrounding land has been entered, filed upon, or sold by the Government: Provided, That not more than 160 acres shall be sold to any one person."

The law as it exists is general in its provisions and has been in operation for many years. Where lands have been opened to settlement under special provisions it is held by the Interior Department the provisions of the foregoing section do not apply. In such cases there is no law authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to sell or dispose of isolated tracts situated therein.

The ceded portion of the Great Sioux Reservation in South Dakota may serve as an example. This is disposed of under the provisions of section 1 of the act of March 2, 1889. (25 Stat. L., 888.) Under this act the disposal of the lands is restricted to actual settlers only under the provisions of the homestead law and under the law relating to town sites. It is held by the Department that lands the disposal of which is thus restricted can not be sold under the provisions of the foregoing section. (See case of W. D. Harrington, 29 L. D., 153, and case of Jos. L. White, 30 L. D., 536.)

There appears to the committee no valid reason why the provisions of the existing statute should not be extended and the law made applicable alike to all lands, notwithstanding the specific provision under which the same may have been opened.

The bill has the approval of the Interior Department, and the communications of the Secretary and of the Commissioner of the General Land Office are herewith submitted and made a part of this report.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 1, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by reference from your committee for views thereon, of a copy of S. 6290, entitled "A bill to extend the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by act of February 26, 1895, relating to public lands."

In answer to the reference I inclose a copy of the favorable report on the bill by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under date of July 8, 1902, in which I concur.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS, Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 8, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by your reference for early report, in duplicate, of a copy of Senate bill No. 6290, "To extend the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by act of February 26, 1895, relating to public lands."

Said bill provides:

"That where any of the public lands of the United States are now open, or shall hereafter be opened to actual settlers only, under the provisions of the homestead law and under the law relating to town sites, and for that reason section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by act of February 26, 1895, relating to the sale of isolated or disconnected tracts or parcels, is not applicable from and after the passage and approval of this act, a sale under the last-named section as so amended of any isolated or disconnected tracts or parcels may be ordered by the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided, however, That the minimum price for which such tracts or parcels shall be sold shall be the price required by the act under which the land so sold is subject to entry: And provided further, That where no price is provided in the act opening the said lands, then the price for which said lands shall be sold shall be not less than $1.25 per acre."

I am of the opinion where lands have been or may hereafter be thrown open to entry under the homestead or town-site laws only, and any small or isolated tract or tracts thereof have remained undisposed of under the special acts for a period of three years after the surrounding lands have been entered, filed upon, or sold by the Government, that it is strong presumptive evidence that they are not suitable for the purposes intended and might, therefore, be properly disposed of under section 2455 Revised Statutes.

For the reason stated I recommend favorable action on the bill.

Copy of Senate bill 6290 and of this report herewith inclosed.

Very respectfully,

BINGER HERMANN, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, without intending the slightest discourtesy to the Interior Department, they sometimes recommend measures that I think after full discussion the Senate would not agree to. This proposed legislation is not clear to me, and I would be very glad if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] would explain just what is intended by it. I do not, of course, want to object to the consideration of the bill if I can help it.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, the general law, as it exists, permits the sale by the Commissioner of the General Land Office of segregated tracts of public land after the surrounding land has been settled and occupied for a space of three years or upward. Small, isolated unoccupied tracts can then be advertised and sold, but to no one person can there be a sale made exceeding 160 acres. That is the general law as it exists. This proposed act——

Mr. DUBOIS. It is all public land to which the bill applies?

Mr. GAMBLE. It is all public land.

Mr. DUBOIS. It does not apply to any lands which under any laws have been segregated from the public domain?

Mr. GAMBLE. It is a general law, section 2455 of the Revised Statutes, to which I refer. Now, where reservations have been opened under special acts of Congress the Department of the Interior has held that the general law does not apply to those reservations. The object is simply to make the general law applicable to these reservations. That is the purport of the bill. It was drawn practically by the Department. The question came up in my own State by correspondence from there, as affecting the great Sioux Reservation. I looked into it. There are some small tracts there that had not been selected and occupied and applications were made for their purchase, but it was held by the Department that under existing law the Commissioner of the General Land Office could not offer the lands for sale.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Why could he not?

Mr. GAMBLE. Because it was held and determined by the Department in the two cases referred to that the general law was not applicable where they were opened by special act of Congress. In certain cases there were no prices fixed, and this proposed law fixes the price.

Mr. DUBOIS. As I understand it, a reservation is opened and a stipulated price is fixed which shall be paid for the land. In the selection some lands are not taken up at all, and by the provisions under which they were reserved the Department holds that they can not dispose of these lands, because they come under the provisions made in opening the reservation.

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But we have removed all those restrictions and opened the lands to homestead entry.

Mr. GAMBLE. Not all of them. This, as I said, simply carries the general law into effect upon all these locations. As a matter of fact, this only affects small tracts, because it is undesirable pieces that have not been taken. People want to buy them for grazing purposes. An application was made and the Department held that the Commissioner of the General Land Office had no authority to offer them for sale; and by the bill it is simply to be done under the jurisdiction and best judgment of the Interior Department. I think the proposed law is wise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INSTRUCTORS IN PUBLIC MARINE SCHOOLS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 7044) to authorize the President to detail officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service as superintendents or instructors in the public marine schools.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the President of the United States, when in his opinion the same may be done without detriment to the public service, to detail proper officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service as superintendents of or instructors in the public marine schools mentioned in the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act to encourage the establishment of public marine schools."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS, ETC.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask ananimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3112) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to determine all claims of the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians of Colorado.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That jurisdiction, legal and equitable, be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claims of the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior and the Mississippi for certain sums of money claimed by said Indians to be due them under the several treaties dating from 1837 to 1855, which sums have been covered into the Treasury of the United States at various times since the year 1843, and that said action shall be entitled "The Chippewas of Lake Superior and the Mississippi against The United States," if brought jointly, and if brought separately shall be entitled "The Chippewas of Lake Superior against The United States," or "The Chippewas of the Mississippi against The United States," and may be instituted by said Indians in said court by a petition filed and verified, under oath, by any attorney authorized to represent said Chippewas of Lake Superior and by any attorney authorized to represent said Chippewas of the Mississippi, to which action or actions the United States shall be made defendants.

To hear and determine the claims of the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior and the Mississippi for certain sums of money claimed by said Indians to be due them under the several treaties prior to 1863, in the difference in value between coin and the currency paid to said Indians during the years from 1863 to 1864, inclusive; and said action shall be entitled "The Chippewas of Lake Superior and the Mississippi against The United States," if brought jointly, and if brought separately shall be entitled "The Chippewas of Lake Superior against The United States," or "The Chippewas of the Mississippi against The United States;" and may be instituted by said Indians in said court by a petition filed and verified under oath by any attorney authorized to represent said Chippewas of Lake Superior and said Chippewas of the Mississippi, or either; to such action or actions the United States shall be made defendants.

And to hear and determine the claim of the Delaware Indians in the Cherokee Nation, arising under the following statement:

First. Whether the United States received the sum of $286,742.15, or any part thereof, from the sale of lands of the Delaware Indians under the treaties of 1860 and 1861 in gold coin.

Second. If so, was the United States under obligation to pay the said Indians in gold coin the interest and principal of the said sum of $286,742.15, or any part thereof?

Third. If so, did the United States pay the said Indians the principal and interest, or any part thereof, in anything but gold coin; and if so, what was the difference in value between the bonds or currency paid to said Indians and gold coin at the time the several payments were made to said Indians out of the fund aforesaid?

Fourth. If so, did said Indians make objection to payment in anything but gold coin, and did said Indians voluntarily waive their right to payment in gold coin without objecting to the receipt of bonds or currency?

Fifth. If no waiver was made by said Indians, is the United States still obligated to pay said Indians such difference in value between gold coin, principal and interest, or any part thereof, which the United States was under obligation to pay and the currency value of the money or bonds actually paid to said Indians?

And said action may be brought by said Delaware Indians (residing in the Cherokee Nation), and shall be entitled "The Delaware Indians against The United States," and shall be instituted by petition, duly verified by such member of said Delaware Indian tribe as is authorized to represent them, or by any of the counsel and attorneys employed by said Delaware Indians, or by their representative, to which action the United States shall be made defendants: Provided, That any sums that may be found due said Delaware Indians in the final adjudication of such suit shall, when appropriated, be paid to said Delaware tribe of Indians as said tribe in council shall direct, except so much as the court shall, upon the rendition of any judgment under the provisions of this act, allow for the payment of the proper fees, expenses, and compensation to the representatives of said Delawares and the counsel and attorneys of record, whose several interests therein shall be determined by the court.

And to hear and determine all claims and demands of the White River Utes, Southern Utes, Uncompahgre Utes, Tabeyuache, Muache, Capote, Weeminuche, Yampa, Grand River, and Uinta bands of Ute Indians, known also as the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians of Colorado, as defined in the treaty of March 2, 1868, and agreement ratified by Congress and said Indians of June 15, 1880, against the United States arising under treaties and agreements with the United States ratified by Congress, including the claims of said Indians to compensation for lands embraced within the metes and bounds of the reservations defined by such treaties and agreements which have been set apart for forest and timber reservations, or to the occupation of railroads or other public use, and all demands on the part of the United States and claims against said Indians growing out of treaty obligations and agreements ratified by Congress, except judgments of the Court of Claims for depredations committed by said Indians. In considering said case it is made the duty of the court to determine, first, the legality or illegality of the action of the Government in creating by Executive order any forest or timber reservations with the lands ceded by the act of July 15, 1880, and, second, whether or not the Government incurred any liability to said Indians by creating such forest or timber reservations, and if such liability was incurred, the extent thereof; that said action may be commenced by the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians by petition filed in said court by Josiah M. Vale, Courtland C. Clements, Kie Oldham, William C. Shelley, Adair Wilson, and William S. Peabody, the attorneys named in the contracts between said Indians and said attorneys on file in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, bearing date November 7, 1896, October 31, 1896, and July 1, 1897, who are authorized to represent said Indians in said action, the said petition to be verified under oath by either of said attorneys, to which action the United States shall be made defendants.

That the Attorney-General is hereby directed to appear and defend each of said actions provided for herein; that the petition in each case shall be filed in said court within one year from the date of the passage of this act, and the United States shall answer to each of said petitions within sixty days from the date of the filing of the same unless the time for pleading shall be enlarged by the court; that either party to each said actions may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and such cases, both in the Court of Claims and in the Supreme Court, shall be preferred cases and advanced on the dockets of the courts above mentioned and shall be heard and determined as early as practicable. The judgment of said Court of Claims, or of the Supreme Court, if appeal is taken thereto, shall be final and conclusive as to the rights of all parties interested.

That at the time of rendering judgment in each case the Court of Claims shall, as part of its findings and as a part of such judgment, fix and enter of record proper allowances for expenses and compensation to representatives and fees to counsel and attorneys, which may be paid direct to the persons entitled thereto as soon as there is any money in the Treasury available for the payment of such judgment, the fees to attorneys and counsel not to exceed in each case 15 per cent of the amount of the judgment: Provided, That in cases appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States the Court of Claims may, in its discretion, increase the allowances for cost and fees therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claims of the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior and the Mississippi, and to determine the claims of the White River or Confederated Bands of Ute Indians of Colorado and the Delaware Indians."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to have the bill (S. 2205) to correct the military record of Joseph T. Vincent considered. It will take only a moment. The man is waiting to get into a Soldiers' Home.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. McCOMAS. I would be very glad to yield at any other time, but the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. SCOTT. It will take only a minute, I will say to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. McCOMAS. There would be others who would desire the same indulgence. I am sorry, Mr. President, that I am not able to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no discretion but to present to the Senate the special order, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

Mr. McCOMAS. I yield for a moment to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I desire to mention my understanding of the parliamentary situation. First, the special order in no way displaces the regular order, which is the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that on the next legislative day at 2 o'clock the bill pending as the unfinished business will be taken up for consideration, unless by unanimous consent it is otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. And further, Mr. President, I understand that no legislative business or executive business is to be transacted today in the Senate after the expiration of the special order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. NELSON. I did not hear the last request.

Mr. QUAY. That no business be transacted after the exercises now pending are determined.

Mr. McCOMAS. I assure the Senator that at the termination of these exercises my colleague, the senior Senator from Maryland, will ask that the resolutions be adopted and move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WELLINGTON. That is the understanding.

ACCEPTANCE OF STATUES OF CHARLES CARROLL AND JOHN HANSON.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. President, I present the following concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the thanks of Congress be presented to the State of Maryland for providing the bronze statues of Charles Carroll of Carrollton and John Hanson, citizens of Maryland, illustrious for their historic renown and distinguished civic services.

Resolved, That the statues be accepted and placed in the National Statuary Hall in the Capitol, and that a copy of these resolutions duly authenticated be transmitted to the governor of the State of Maryland.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the gentlemen who constitute the Maryland statuary commission for the presentation of the statues of Charles Carroll of Carrollton and John Hanson be admitted to the floor, and I ask that the descendants of the distinguished men who are thus honored and the ladies and others of their party may have the privilege of occupying during these exercises the gallery reserved for the families of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the commission of the State of Maryland who have under charge the statues be admitted to the floor of the Senate, and that the ladies and gentlemen accompanying them be admitted to the reserved gallery of the Senate. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland? The Chair hears none, and the request is granted.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. President, the State of Maryland has placed in the National Statuary Hall the bronze statues of Charles Carroll of Carrollton and John Hanson, and the purpose of the resolutions that I have just offered is that now they be presented to Congress for acceptance. The State statuary commission, who appreciate the courtesy of the Senate on this occasion, have well performed their office, for the works of the artist are worthy of their subjects and of a place in yonder hall.

Maryland has nearly three centuries of history wherefrom to choose two citizens illustrious in her annals and worthy of this national commemoration. My State did not accord this high honor to the founder, George Calvert, nor to Cæcilius Calvert, the second Lord Baltimore, the father of the province; nor to the gallant leaders of the Maryland Line, to Howard, Smallwood, Williams, or De Kalb, commanders of that body of soldiers which early won the confidence of Washington, which, at Brooklyn Heights, by its discipline and bravery, saved our army when surrounded, which maintained this honorable distinction for steadiness and gallantry until in the last pitched battle of the Revolution, at Eutaw Springs, that same Maryland Line drove the flower of the English infantry at the point of the bayonet; nor to her orators or jurists or lawyers who, living before Luther Martin and William Pinkney or in their day or after them, emulated their fame and glory.

From among all her renowned sons Maryland chose Charles Carroll of Carrollton and John Hanson, as most worthy of this national commemoration.

And with reason has my State presented the statues of these illustrious men to join the company of the great and good already gathered together in the old Hall of Representatives. The story of the Revolution grows in dramatic interest as the long perspective grows. As the Revolution recedes, each succeeding generation finds augmented fascination in the great story, and draws increasing patriotism from this inspiring panorama of our history and this immense event in the history of the English-speaking people.

The stupidest King England ever had was then on the throne. He never long endured a prime minister if his talent rose above that of a gentleman usher.

The American colonists were the least governed and the freest of English subjects. They were prosperous. They loved the Kingdom and the King. They loved the English name and tradition, the literature, the architecture and arts of England, its historic places, its very soil, for England was to them the old home. They were freemen and mostly freeholders, and they loved liberty. The history of English liberty was the history of a struggle for the rights of the individual citizen as respects person, property, and opinion, so that he shall have nothing to fear from the tyranny of an executive or of a Parliament; a struggle which began with Magna Charta and lasted down to the Bill of Rights and to the Declaration of Independence.

The indissoluble connection between taxation and representation was the basis of the English conception of freedom. That no man should be taxed without his own consent was the principle which was the root of the American Revolution.

The glorious wars of the elder Pitt had raised from the dust the standard of Great Britain, had restored her prestige and power, but had also enormously increased her debt. The colonists, under the guidance of the elder Pitt, had cheerfully given men and money. They had followed Braddock to defeat, and Howe and Amherst and Wolfe to victory. As compatriots of English veterans they had helped drive the French from the Great Lakes and from the valley of the Ohio, joined in the capture of Ticonderoga and Crown Point, the siege of Quebec, and the conquest of Canada.

The elder Pitt would not have appealed in vain to the colonies, who loved him, to tax themselves to help pay their share of debt for these wars. But the great minister had given place to a pliant tool of a dull King.

As the burden had been partly incurred in the defense of the colonies, George Granville resolved that the colonies should bear their share of it. They had no representation in Parliament and therefore the colonies replied that taxation and representation went hand in hand. Blunder followed blunder until loyalty to King and Parliament died out in the colonies.

The province of Maryland had little cause for a change of government. The proprietary government was mild, and reposed on popular affection. The colonists were a homogeneous people, prosperous and contented, although the bigotry of the age had imposed disabilities on Catholics in the only province whose Catholic founders had dedicated it to civil and religious liberty and to the broadest toleration.

The colonial governor, Robert Eden, was beloved and respected. The colony was rapidly growing. Maryland was the fourth colony in population and importance when she joined in the Revolution from love of liberty, and from honorable sympathy with the general welfare of her sister colonies. On this broad and generous ground she gave her adhesion to the Revolution, and authorized her delegates in the Continental Congress to concur in the Declaration of Independence.

It is because of their part in the great drama of the Revolution, their unfailing devotion to the cause of liberty, their great power and influence at critical periods of the struggle with Great Britain, their characters and lives, that Maryland has selected John Hanson and Charles Carroll of Carrollton to dwell in enduring bronze in yonder American pantheon.

Most of the thirteen original States have contributed statues to our National Gallery. It is unfortunate that so few of the illustrious men of the Revolution have been sent to join the solemn circle there. It is to be regretted that hitherto only three of the signers of the great Declaration face each other there.

American public life in that time of trial and danger was adorned by many striking figures. Washington, Franklin, Hamilton, Jefferson, and Marshall of that generation belong to the history of the world. Many of their associates will forever live in American history. They stand in the forefront of the nation's life. Therefore I rejoice that Maryland now brings to the old Hall of Representatives for the acceptance of Congress two men of the Revolution, one of them the President of a Congress of the Revolution, the other the last surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence, that great act with which our nation's history begins.

JOHN HANSON.

John Hanson was born in 1715 in Charles County, Md., and lived there until, in 1773, he removed to Frederick County, then rapidly growing. He had nine times represented Charles County in the provincial assembly. In trying times John Hanson was by nature a leader. The "Boston port bill" roused the peaceful province to make common cause with Massachusetts. We find Hanson a delegate from Frederick to a congress at Annapolis, and as chairman of the committee of observation of his county sending money to John Adams for the poor of Boston, later helping to raise two companies of riflemen in Frederick. Walking all the way in twenty-two days, Capt. Michael Cresap and Capt. Thomas Price marched their Frederick riflemen into Cambridge. The Frederick companies were the first Southern troops to join Washington.

At Annapolis in 1775 Hanson fearlessly joined in the overthrow of the proprietary government and in placing supreme control in the provincial convention. The cautious convention, hoping for reunion with Britain, had precluded our delegates in Congress from declaring for independence of the colonies. Hanson and the Frederick County patriots now assembled and resolved "That what may be recommended by a majority of the Congress equally delegated by the people of the United Colonies we will at the hazard of our lives and fortunes support and maintain, and that every resolution of the convention tending to separate this province from a majority of the colonies without the consent of the people is destructive to our internal safety." Samuel Chase and Charles Carroll had just returned from their mission to Canada, and had taken their seats in the new convention. Carroll was mainly instrumental in causing the convention to recall its former instructions and empowering the Maryland delegates in Congress to concur "in declaring the United Colonies free and independent States."

John Hanson, with unflagging spirit, in the legislature and in the Continental Congress supported the great struggle for independence.

During his three successive terms in the Continental Congress, John Hanson was engaged in battling for another great cause, whose successful issue changed the whole course of our national life. It is recorded in the journals of Congress that "on March 1, 1781, John Hanson and Daniel Carroll did sign and ratify the Articles of Confederation of the United States."

This action was the crowning historic service in Hanson's career.

The far-reaching consequences of the struggle which ended when Hanson signed the Articles of Confederation are now better understood. We all recall that in November, 1777, Congress submitted the Articles of Confederation to the State legislatures for ratification. Within fifteen months they were ratified by all the States except Maryland. Our State refused ratification until those States claiming the northwestern back lands, and especially Virginia, should surrender their claims of western territory to the Confederation. This action of Maryland led directly to the formation of the Federal Union. In October, 1777, when the Articles of Confederation were about to be presented by Congress to the States for ratification, Maryland alone voted that Congress shall have the sole right and power to determine the western boundary of such States as claim to the Mississippi and lay out the land beyond this boundary into separate and independent States from time to time as the number and circumstances of the people may require. This would compel Virginia, New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts to surrender their claims to the vast interior and thus create a domain to be owned by the Confederacy until new States grew up and should be admitted into it. Maryland alone voted for this bold centralization. The States protested against the attitude of Maryland. Here and there leading men were heard to threaten to divide the little State on the Chesapeake among her neighbors and then declare the Confederation complete.

All other States had ratified the articles when, in May, 1779, Maryland again communicated to the Congress her unalterable resolve not to concur until she received definite assurances that the Northwest Territory should become the common property of the United States, "subject to be parceled out by Congress into free, convenient, and independent governments." New York first yielded. Daniel Carroll and John Hanson, from Maryland, persistently pressed this demand of their State, and in September, 1780, Congress, yielding, recommended all States claiming Western lands to cede them to the Confederation. A month later Congress advanced further, and adopted the Maryland plan, declaring that from the ceded lands in due season sovereign States, like the thirteen, should be admitted into the Union.

Virginia and Connecticut yielded their claims and long after Massachusetts abandoned her shadowy claims to the Western lands. The area of Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio thus became the common property of the Confederation. And so Hanson and Daniel Carroll, after this triumph had been secured, largely by their efforts, signed the Articles of Confederation. It was Maryland that during the period of Hanson's service led the way to acquire a national domain, and thus laid broad and deep the foundation of our Federal Union. For his share in this pregnant service, John Hanson's name will be associated forever with laying the corner stone of our great nation. Out of this first ordinance grew the Ordinance of 1784, and later the great Ordinance of 1787, and later the Constitution and the United States of America. For this act alone, John Hanson is worthy of his place in the goodly company gathered in the old Hall of Representatives. The Confederation of the States was now complete, and on November 5, 1781, John Hanson was elected the first President of the Congress of the Confederation.

This elevation to the Presidency was a signal compliment and a great honor to Maryland. It has a much larger meaning as we look back now over the stately procession of the great Commonwealths successively entering the Union. The persistent refusal of Maryland to consent to the Confederation until she won from her reluctant associated States consent that the Western territory should be dedicated to the Union, made smooth the pathway for Vermont, Kentucky, and Maine to enter the Union as independent States, carved out of the magnificent domain Maryland directly secured to the Union, the great Commonwealths of Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin, and determined for all coming time that the after acquired territory of the United States should in due time by Congress be fashioned and admitted as States, augmenting the power of the Republic and the grandeur of the American Union.

By this election to the Presidency of Congress John Hanson became in a political sense the foremost person in the United States and represented its dignity. His title was "President of the United States in Congress assembled." After the decisive victory at Yorktown President Hanson had the felicity to welcome General Washington and present him to Congress, then sitting in Philadelphia.

On November 4, 1782, President Hanson's term expired. The war was ended, the last British soldier was soon to sail away from New York. Peace was in sight. At 68 years of age Hanson was worn out in the public service. His health was broken. He refused to accept further public service. He died November 22, 1783, in the State he loved, and his State, one hundred and twenty years after his death, bestows upon his name the highest honor whereby an American State can commemorate an illustrious citizen.

CHARLES CARROLL OF CARROLLTON.

Charles Carroll of Carrollton was born at Annapolis, September 19, 1737. His grandfather, Charles Carroll, the attorney-general of the province, came over to Maryland in 1688. His father, Charles Carroll, was one of the richest men of his day and country. It was the custom of wealthy colonists to send their sons over the sea for education and travel. So young Carroll, sent as a boy of 11 years to the Jesuit College at St. Omers, and later to colleges at Rheims and Paris, was a student at the Temple in London at 20. Eight years of London life to an accomplished young colonist, who at the "Crown and Anchor" more than once met Dr. Johnson and Sir Joshua Reynolds, now and then dined with Burke, heard Charles Fox expatiate upon liberty, or time and again listened to the eloquence and saw Parliament bow before the greatness of the elder Pitt inspired young Carroll with the ideals of the noblest Englishmen. He came home to Annapolis at 28 years of age. The news of the stamp act of 1765 soon stirred with unwonted anger against their King the pleasure-loving colonists of the little capital and of the province.

Young Carroll had been strongly moved by the words of Pitt, the first English orator whose words were a power over Parliament, over the nation, and over the colonies. Though passionate, Pitt's eloquence was the eloquence of a statesman. Perchance the law student at the Temple had sat in the gallery and heard Pitt's trumpet tongue declare "Taxation is no part of the governing or legislative power. The taxes are a voluntary gift and grant of the Commons alone. In legislation the three estates of the realm are alike concerned; but the concurrence of the peers and Crown is only necessary to clothe it with the form of law. The gift and grant is of the Commons alone."

When the wave of good feeling after the repeal of the stamp act had been rudely checked by Charles Townshend's 3 pence tax on tea, young Carroll must have rejoiced that Pitt had said: "In my opinion this Kingdom has no right to lay a tax on the colonies. America is almost in open rebellion. I rejoice that America has resisted."

Already one of the wealthiest of the colonists, Carroll's religion debarred him from holding office. The Sons of Liberty were organized. Carroll joined them. He wore homespun. He counseled resistance to tyranny, and in a discussion with Daniel Dulaney, the ablest lawyer in the colony, Carroll, in a series of letters signed "First Citizen," won a signal victory over his brilliant adversary and a high place in public confidence, ranking as a popular leader alongside Chase, Paca, and Stone.

Annapolis, at the mouth of beautiful Severn, under sunny skies in a mild climate, had grown to be one of the centers of social life and refinement on the continent. Ships from all lands came to its harbor and brought to the young city the chief trade of the province. Theaters, race courses, balls, and social assemblies spread the fame of the enjoyable life at the Maryland capital. The wealthy planters wintered there in capacious mansions. The officials of the province, with the popular Governor Eden at their head, extended their hospitality to make life joyous.

The provincial assembly, the assize, and higher courts added features to the life. From other colonies visitors came and lingered, and among them now and then was Col. George Washington. Daniel Dulaney, unrivaled lawyer and scholar, lived here. William Pinkney, the foremost orator and lawyer of his time and country, was here growing to manhood. Charles Wilson Peale, born here, had returned from England to this wealthy capital of a fruitful land to paint the portraits of Maryland's gentry and the worthies of the Revolution. The wide circles, the narrow streets, with enduring brick mansions of the time of the Georges, still leave Annapolis the most quaint and interesting capital in our country, as it is among the most beautiful. May these historic landmarks survive the perils of its present rapid growth.

On October 19, 1774, when the people of the neighboring counties thronged in Annapolis and denounced "the Boston port bill," the brig Peggy Stewart, from London, came into port with 2,000 pounds of tea. In June the provincial assembly had forbidden all importations of "that detestable weed, tea." The irritated populace threatened violence to Anthony Stewart, the owner; Williams, the consignee, and the ship itself. Stewart and Williams confessed to the people's committee "that they had been guilty of a daring insult, an act of the most pernicious tendency, to the leaders of America," and offered to burn the tea. When they sought aid from Charles Carroll of Carrollton he promptly advised that Stewart must set fire to both ship and tea. So Stewart reluctantly went on board and set fire to his ship, and with her sails set and colors flying, in the presence of the patriotic multitude, the Peggy Stewart burned to the water's edge. In Maryland the 19th of October is a holiday to commemorate the day when pacific Maryland placed herself in line with stubborn Boston and Massachusetts Bay. In December news of the burning of the Peggy Stewart reached London, to the great alarm of the merchants of Threadneedle street, and the House of Commons began to take America more seriously.

In January, 1775, Carroll became a member of the first committee of observation at Annapolis, and was elected a delegate to represent Anne Arundel County in the provincial convention, which soon named him upon the committee of safety.

The provincial convention to Carroll's disgust disavowed any design of colonial independence. Unhappily for the province, Carroll's character, influence, and patriotic labors had attracted attention in Congress. Early in 1776 Congress appointed Benjamin Franklin, Samuel Chase, and Charles Carroll as commissioners to Canada to secure her cooperation with the United Provinces against Great Britain. This plan, once hopeful, had become hopeless by the defeat and death of Montgomery, by the levying of contributions to feed our starving army, by the manifest incapacity of our commanders and the inferiority of our forces. The Canadians were friendly, then suspicious, then irritated, then hostile. The population, nearly all Catholic, were turned against us by their priests. Charles Carroll and Rev. John Carroll in vain tried to secure the aid of their co-religionists. Carroll's journal, in his excellent English, vividly tells this story of their inevitable failure. Canada was destined to remain a British dominion until a day in the distant future.

In Carroll's absence, on May 8, 1776, the Maryland convention had again instructed the Maryland delegates in Congress not to agree to a final separation from Great Britain. Soon afterwards Hanson and the patriots of Frederick had sounded a trumpet call for complete independence.

Carroll now hastened to Annapolis and resumed his seat to urge the repeal of these instructions. No time was to be lost. This was a crisis in the Revolution. On June 28, 1776, the new instructions advocated by Carroll were given. On July 2, 1776, our Maryland delegates found themselves authorized to vote for independence.

The zeal and ability of Carroll in winning his State to take this action, he had so early and so steadily urged, led to his immediate appointment as a Delegate from Maryland to the Continental Congress. On July 4, 1776, Charles Carroll of Carrollton was appointed, along with Matthew Tilghman, Thomas Johnson, William Paca, Samuel Chase, and Thomas Stone, delegates to that famous Congress. Carroll hastened to Philadelphia in time to vote on July 19 to engross this great paper. On August 2 Chase, Paca, Stone, and Carroll affixed their signatures to the Declaration of Independence. Charles Carroll of Carrollton with alacrity risked his life and his great fortune by signing this charter of the new Republic, "this document unparalleled in the annals of mankind." The board of war was Adams, Sherman, Harrison, Wilson, and Rutledge, and to those Carroll was soon added. Chairman John Adams tells us that on July 18 Carroll was so chosen, and that he was "an excellent member, whose education, manners, and application to business and to study did honor to his fortune, the first in America."

In August Carroll returned to a seat in the Maryland convention, which adopted the bill of rights and constitution which created Maryland a sovereign State.

It was Carroll who suggested the mode of choosing the State senate of Maryland, which suggested, as Madison tells us, to the framers of the Federal Constitution the mode of choosing the Senators of this Senate, the method by which we now hold our seats here.

After the fashion of that day, Carroll went to and from the State assembly and the Continental Congress. He belonged to both.

To his lasting honor Carroll unwaveringly supported on the board of war and in Congress the great commander, and helped defeat the Conway cabal, designed to put Gates in Washington's place. We find Carroll in 1778 with the Maryland delegates urging the cession of the public lands to the Confederation, and steadily struggling to secure this sure foundation for the coming Federal Union, until he resigned from Congress at the close of 1778.

The French treaty gave Carroll confidence in our ultimate success in the war, and he believed his services in the State senate of Maryland would be his most effective way to help the army in the field. There he advocated generous support of Washington, and voted troops and financial aid to the war. He steadily opposed confiscation of the property of British subjects, and also all the wild currency schemes to which our countrymen were then prone to turn for relief. He firmly urged the Maryland policy of dedication of the Western territory to the Confederation.

He was in the Maryland senate leading the fight to secure Maryland's ratification of the Constitution of 1789. Long before his fellows, Carroll had advocated independence, and in advance of his associates he advocated a Federal Union. He had declined election to the Congress of the Confederation because he foresaw its powerlessness.

Washington and Gates, commissioners from Virginia, met Carroll Stone and Samuel Hughes, commissioners from Maryland, to arrange to open and extend the navigation of the Potomac. They met December 22, 1784, at Annapolis, and later at Mount Vernon. The Maryland report asked that Pennsylvania and Delaware should be included, because the scheme of navigation included a canal between Delaware River and the Chesapeake. The outcome was the Annapolis convention of 1786, which led to the Federal Convention which framed our Constitution.

Thus the signer of the Declaration had a part in the beginning of the Constitution.

Under the new Constitution Carroll was elected to the First Congress as a Senator from Maryland. His colleague was John Henry. In April, 1789, he appeared in the Senate. Congress had assembled in the old city hall of New York. Carroll, the friend of Washington, Hamilton, and Franklin, was a determined Federalist. He drew a two years' term in the Senate. He reported the now famous judiciary act. He declared for a standing army. He successfully labored to establish this Federal District, in whose Capitol his statue will hereafter stand. He reported the assumption bill which buttressed the Federal Union. He was reelected to the Senate in 1791, but resigned that he might remain in the Maryland senate, a State statute now forbidding service in both bodies at the same time. In 1801 the party of Jefferson triumphed, and thereby, at 63 years of age, ended the public career of Charles Carroll, the Federalist. During thirty years of public life he had left his impress upon the times.

At his beautiful home, Doughoregan Manor, or at his town house in Baltimore, he spent the remaining thirty-three years of his long life, devoted to his large estate, to his home and kindred, to the Bible, to the classics, and to polite learning, always mindful of his religion and his country. On July 4, 1822, Carroll helped lay the corner stone of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which he helped promote. He who, with Washington, forty years before sought by the Potomac navigation scheme to unite the Ohio with the sea, still a farseeing Federalist statesman at 85 years of age foresaw that the American Union could not have endured until our day without the railroads. For political and social purposes railroads and steamships, telegraphs and telephones, have made our vast country as compact and intimate as was New England a century ago.

At 90 years of age Carroll was erect and vigorous, with the vivacity and grace of youth. In person he was small and slight. His face was strong, his eye piercing, his manners easy and winning. About this time he heard the impressive tidings of the death of Adams and Jefferson on the 4th of July, 1826. To him came the address of Daniel Webster upon Adams and Jefferson and that stately apostrophe to the last of the signers:

"Of the illustrious signers of the Declaration of Independence there now remains only one, Charles Carroll. He seems an aged oak, standing alone on the plain, which time has spared a little longer after all of its contemporaries have been leveled with the dust. Venerable object! we delight to gather around its trunk while yet it stands, and to dwell beneath its shadow. Sole survivor of an assembly of as great men as the world has witnessed, in a transaction one of the most important that history records, what thoughts, what interesting reflections, must fill his elevated and devout soul! If he dwell on the past, how touching its recollections; if he survey the present, how happy, how joyous, how full of the fruition of that hope which his ardent patriotism indulged; if he glance at the future, how does the prospect of his country's advancement almost bewilder his weakened conception! Fortunate distinguished patriot! Interesting relic of the past! Let him know that while we honor the dead we do not forget the living; and that there is not a heart here which does not fervently pray that Heaven may keep him yet back from the society of his companions."

That solemn prayer was granted. Charles Carroll of Carrollton lived until his ninety-sixth year, and on November 14, 1832, died with the calmness of a philosopher and with the faith of a holy man of God.

The work of Carroll and Hanson and their compatriots of the Revolution gave to the world the first true Federal state; and they built it to endure the storms and stress of civil war. They so cemented it that all fears of its disruption have disappeared forever. It is the great Republic of all history. In it the law is supreme. No man is so high as to be above the law. In the very fiber of the people is inbred a regard for law, which is the security of our rights and the basis of our prosperous and happy civil government. Yet under it the people shape their own destiny and unhindered walk in their own paths.

Looking back over the one hundred and twenty-seven years of our existence as a nation, one truth is luminous. The world would not if it could erase the great Republic from the map of the globe.

The future of civilization rests with the Anglo-Saxon race. Not the British Empire, but the American Republic will lead that race onward to that future. Traditional, moral, political, and intellectual ties unite in a sense all who speak the English language, to-day the leading language of the world. Mr. Bryce justly boasts that "England has sent her language, her commerce, her laws, and institutions forth from herself over an even wider and more populous area than that whose races were molded into new forms by the laws and institutions of Rome."

The marvelous achievements of the English-speaking people, reaching forth from their little island world, are sure to be surpassed by several hundred millions of English-speaking people of fifty powerful States in an invincible Republic whose home is the vast center of a continent washed by both oceans.

Lord Rosebery, the foremost statesman and orator of the British Empire in our day, has outlined in historic vision what would have been the future of the English-speaking people had George III listened to reason and had the thirteen colonies sent representatives to the Imperial Parliament. He predicted that at last when the Americans became the majority, the seat of empire would have been moved across the Atlantic, and Britain would have become the historic shrine and European outpost of the world empire, with the English-speaking Federal Parliament sitting in Columbia territory somewhere in the Mississippi Basin.

Simpler and grander far is the historic reality. The great Republic has been worthy of its heritage. It has lifted up humanity and liberty. It has advanced civilization. It leads the commerce of the world. It is the richest nation on the globe. It is now the world's center of finance. It is invincible in war, if war approach its shores. It is fast reaching out to control the seas. Its people are happy, free, homogeneous—the most intelligent, and soon to be the most numerous. It is the greatest self-governing nation and the greatest world power. Its foreign policy is a synonym for justice. Its creed is peace.

The future of the English-speaking peoples depends upon our Republic, and that future, in the vigorous embrace of the younger world, is boundless.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, every man who has visited a great gallery will remember some picture that caught his attention and dwells in his memory because of some single stroke or feature. It will seem of little importance when he comes to tell of it. But that is what caught his eye and led him to pause before it when a hundred more celebrated works of more famous painters were neglected or forgotten. It abides with him for the rest of his life. If it be a landscape, it may be some single rock or tree. If it be a Dutch interior, it may be only a ray of light through a window. If it be a portrait, it is but a glance of the eye, or a curl of the lip, or the pose of the head. But it penetrates the soul, and it abides.

Most of our great popular reputations are made in that way. There are a few men like Washington, or like Marshall, or like Webster, or like Lincoln, whose service is so great that their countrymen know every detail of it by heart. But, in general, our great men are remembered not because of sober and faithful labor, not because of long service in legislation, or in the Executive chair, or even in war. Something has found its way to the people's heart and keeps the name fresh.

Old John Adams, though he was President of the United States, is remembered by nine men out of ten for the immortal argument for the Declaration of Independence, ascribed to him by Webster; for the fact that he was our first representative to Great Britain, and for his sublime death at the height of human fame, with the undying words "Independence forever" on his dying lips. As was said of Lord Nelson, by his biographer, "If the chariot and the horses of fire had been vouchsafed for his translation he could scarcely have departed in a brighter blaze of glory."

John Hancock was a great power in the time of the Revolution, and before. But his countrymen in general only know that he signed his name to the Declaration in letters visible across the broad Atlantic, and that he told the patriots to burn Boston, though it contained his whole fortune, if it were needful for the cause of liberty; that he was President of the Continental Congress, and that he was excepted, with Sam Adams, in the royal proclamation of amnesty, as a rebel whose offenses were too flagitious for pardon.

Ask even the men of his own State of Massachusetts, and of his own town of Boston, what they know of Sam Adams. They will tell you that they know that he was a man who was excepted with Hancock from the royal pardon; that he was the man who demanded of Hutchinson the removal of the regiments from Boston, and that when Hutchinson told him he would remove one, answered, "If you have power to remove one you have power to remove both," and that when he told the story afterwards he said, "It was then that I observed his knees tremble, and I enjoyed the sight."

There is an admirable memoir of Charles Carroll, which shows a life extending over almost a century. A large part of it is crowded with honorable public service of the first quality. It shows him fully entitled to rank not only as a foremost statesman of a foremost State, but among the great men of his time, from whatever State they may have come. There has been no time since the Revolution ended when the name of Charles Carroll of Carrollton was not a familiar household word in every home through the length and breadth of the country.

Yet if you had asked, not merely common men, but well-informed men, students of history or graduates of the college or university, men themselves taking an important part in public affairs, they could tell you only that Charles Carroll was a Catholic; that he lived to survive all his companions who signed the Declaration, and that when he signed his name he took care that there should be no doubt of his identity, if the Revolutionary war were a failure and it were in the power of the Royal Government to inflict the death penalty for treason.

Charles Carroll died at 95, in the year 1832. He survived Jefferson and John Adams over six years. Jefferson and John Adams and Carroll had been the only survivors of the signers of the Declaration for eleven years before. It seemed that as each of that immortal company died the affection his countrymen had felt for him was transferred to the survivors.

I suppose, in spite of the bitter political antagonism of that day, in which Jefferson and Adams not only shared, but in which they were the great leaders of the opposite sides, that there were never figures in the history of any people dearer to the popular heart than Thomas Jefferson, as he comes down in history with the Declaration of Independence in one hand and the title deed of Louisiana in the other, and brave and honest old John Adams, who had argued, with a power given to no other man, the side of the country in the great debate of liberty. When Adams and Jefferson died it seemed that the whole of this sentiment gathered and centered upon Carroll.

I can remember when he died, though then but a child of 6 years. The schoolboy used to be asked the question in the school to name the only man living of that illustrious band. And I well remember when the solemn tidings went through the country that Charles Carroll was gone.

Before he died men used to make pilgrimages to his dwelling as to a shrine. My honored and accomplished friend Mr. Winthrop has left on record a graphic account of such a visit.

> I can not but remember that it was my privilege to see and know that venerable person in my early manhood. Entering his drawing-room nearly five and forty years ago, I found him reposing on a sofa and covered with a shawl, and was not even aware of his presence, so shrunk and shriveled by the lapse of years was his originally feeble frame. Quot libras in duce summo! But the little heap on the sofa was soon seen stirring, and, rousing himself from his midday nap, he rose and greeted me with a courtesy and grace which I shall never forget.
> In the ninety-fifth year of his age, as he was, and within a few months of his death, it is not surprising that there should be little for me to recall of that interview save his eager inquiries about James Madison, whom I had just visited at Montpelier, and his affectionate allusions to John Adams, who had gone before him; and save, too, the exceeding satisfaction for myself of having seen and pressed the hand of the last surviving signer of the Declaration.

Webster described him as "an aged oak standing alone on the plain, which time has spared a little longer after all its contemporaries have been leveled with the dust." He says that his countrymen delight to gather around its trunk while it yet stands, and to dwell beneath its shadow.

I will not undertake to do what my honorable friend from Maryland has done so much better—draw the lesson of patriotism which is taught us by the life of Charles Carroll. I have no fear that the great Declaration will ever lose its primacy among the political State papers which have been produced since the beginning of time. To find its superior or its equal we must search the inspired pages of our venerable Scriptures. There have been times, and there will be again, when the great truths on which our fathers planted the Republic, as upon a corner stone, will be denied or scorned or scoffed at by men or parties who, in some fancied stress or political necessity, will endeavor to escape their obligations.

That is true, unhappily, of the Ten Commandments and of the Sermon on the Mount. It is true of every moral and legal obligation, whether of divine or human sanction. The generation and the party and the individual who have disobeyed these high commands perish and are forgotten, while the eternal law of rectitude abides forever. The commanding authority of our great Declaration and the pure fame of the men who framed it and who signed it and who pledged to it their life, fortune, and sacred honor will remain so long as the Republic shall endure. Among them there is no purer and there are few more conspicuous reputations than that of Charles Carroll.

But I should like to speak for a moment of one lesson which has been often forgotten, which the life of Charles Carroll teaches, alone among his illustrious companions.

Charles Carroll was a devoted Catholic. He belonged to that church which preserved for mankind religion, learning, literature, and law through the gloomy centuries known as the Dark Ages. Yet it is the only denomination of Christians against which anything of theological bitterness or bigotry seems to have survived amid the liberality of our enlightened day.

Every few years we hear of secret societies, and even political parties, organized with the sole view of excluding the members of a single Christian church from their equal privileges as American citizens. Yet certainly the men of the Catholic faith have never been behind their countrymen, either as patriot citizens or as patriot soldiers. This spirit of bigotry would have denied the ordinary rights of Americans not only to Charles Carroll and his illustrious cousins, the Archbishop, to Daniel Carroll and Thomas Fitzsimmons, who were among the framers of the Constitution, but to Montgomery and Phil. Sheridan.

The Pilgrim and the Puritan of Massachusetts encountered exile and the horrors of the winter voyage and the wilderness and the wild beast and the savage for civil and religious freedom. But even they saw "as through a glass, darkly." They fell short of that conception of freedom which prevails now. Their treatment of the Quakers and the Baptists will not bear the light to-day. Roger Williams, in his turn, made another forward step and founded his State on the principle of complete tolerance of all Christians. But he, in his turn, excluded all men whom he did not deem to be Christians from a share in the government of his Commonwealth.

The Catholic in Maryland was inspired by a like desire to establish principles of perfect religious tolerance. Even in Maryland, if Mr. Bancroft be right, as late as 1770, it was an offense punishable with death to deny the divinity of Christ. This was after the Catholic had been driven from power. Three of the five members of the committee who reported the Declaration of Independence—Mr. Jefferson, Dr. Franklin, and John Adams—were avowed Unitarians. So, if the law of Maryland had been strictly enforced, these men would have suffered death there if they had declared their faith.

Now, Mr. President, I do not speak of these things by way of reproach. The founders of these three States, foremost among mankind, set their faces toward the sunlight. They are not to be reproached because at the time they took the first step they did not take the last. I mention them only to draw the lesson that it is not fair for the American people to remember against the Catholics only the cruelty, or wrong, or blindness of past ages and to forget the cruelty or wrong in which our own ancestors had a share. The American Catholic, in the early days, laid the State which he founded on the eternal principle of religious toleration. The American Catholic did his full and noble share in winning the liberty and in framing the Constitution of the country which he loves as we do, and which we love as he does.

Let the statue of Charles Carroll, the great statesman of the Revolutionary day, the survivor of the most illustrious company of men that ever assembled on the face of the earth since the Apostles, stand in yonder stately chamber, with the statue of Père Marquette, the Discoverer, and with those of their peers of every State and of every faith, until time shall be no more!

The cord of our destiny is made up of many strands. That cord we hope and believe shall never be severed. The great doctrines of the Declaration may be clouded and hidden, only, as we hope, to shine again with a new and brighter lustre when the clouds have passed by. The Constitution may be amended or altered or disregarded or may perish. Other forms of rule may take the place of the simple but sublime mechanism our fathers devised. But the nation shall abide. The one principle which holds this nation together, expressed in the brief but comprehensive motto, E Pluribus Unum, shall never fail or fade—E Pluribus Unum, of many, one—of many States, one nation; of many races, one people; of many creeds, one faith; of many bended knees, one family of God. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, the reconstruction of the Capitol by the addition of the superb edifices in which the Congress now sits left the old Hall of the House of Representatives deserted and silent; the scenes which had been enacted there only a memory; the voices which had been heard there only an echo of the past. There was at least a proper sentiment in the act of 1864, which for all time to come has made that historic chamber sacred by filling it with monuments which recall the great traditions of the national life.

Mr. Emerson has described the art of the sculptor as the crudest and most helpless expression of the higher faculties of the human mind. It has been even more difficult to select the men to be commemorated than to find artists equal to the task of restoring the image of their person in bronze or marble.

In selecting figures to stand in this national gallery, the older States have an advantage over the new, and most of them have wisely chosen to perpetuate the fame of leaders conspicuous in their colonial life. The State of Maryland, among the most ancient of the American Commonwealths, has picked out two names famous and honored in her annals both before and after the Revolution, and brings them here to take their place among their equals in this hall of fame.

In the case of one of them, John Hanson, she has done a tardy act of justice to a man whose eminence in the public service had been almost lost in the waste of time; a man who in a peculiarly appropriate sense was the representative of the national ideal throughout the Revolutionary struggle. The other, Charles Carroll of Carrollton, had already a definite and secure place among the immortals; not altogether because he was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, for many of them have been literally forgotten, but because when he signed it he added his residence for the purpose, so the fascinating story ran, of enabling the British to find him when they got ready to execute him for treason, along with his wicked associates, according to law; and for the reason that he survived all his contemporaries.

Both were men of commanding talents and irreproachable virtues, and each was in a true sense a distinct embodiment of the spirit of his age. The erection of their statues in the National Capitol is particularly appropriate in these days when the foundations of the national faith are under examination in the light of passing events, and when the American people need more than ever to learn the lessons taught by our fathers.

It is always helpful and refreshing to consider the influences which worked together in the formation of the Government under which we live, and it can not be doubted that the people of Maryland acted with wisdom as well as patriotism when their legislature chose from the long list of her orators, her statesmen, her soldiers, her jurists, these two names which appear side by side among the signers of the protest issued by the "Association of the Freemen" of the State, a year before the Declaration of Independence was framed at Philadelphia, and which are associated in honorable prominence throughout the whole Revolutionary period.

In all future times as the restless throngs, passing through the corridors of the Capitol, pause for a moment before these stately figures the story of our heroic age will be told over and over again, as one generation after another is touched by the inspiration of these epoch-making lives. The State of Maryland in thus honoring the men who spoke and acted for her in the great crisis out of which the National Government arose, when with her scant population and her meager resources she devoted her blood and her treasure, without limit and without terms, to the cause of independence, has encouraged the revival of popular interest in those studies which contribute to a rational interpretation of our history as a people: for it can not be denied that the tendency is strong in the midst of prosperous material surroundings to treat with indifference and neglect the day of small things when the American Republic was taking its first feeble steps toward the arena of the world's great affairs.

The very distance of those memorable years, not to speak of the intervention of tremendous national experiences more recent, has cut off, in a measure at least, the popular view of colonial times, leaving them dim and intangible; making Washington, for example, look more like a marble image than a man, and, with the exception of old Israel Putnam and Col. Ethan Allen, preserving hardly a human likeness of any of the great heroes who surrounded him.

Now, the history of the world, and especially of our part of it, is the most important study that can attract anybody's attention, notwithstanding so much of it is entirely incredible and so much of it obviously false. So far as it has been written down at all, it has been written, so it looks to me, more for the purpose of giving artificial importance to a few generals and a few kings than for the purpose of bringing into view the obscure millions who, after all, make up States and Commonwealths.

I have sometimes wished that some historian, some divinely gifted man or woman, might do for our own country what great creative intellects have done for other lands—what Lord Macaulay, for example, has done for England, or Thomas Carlyle for Scotland—might take us back to the sources of our strength; might show us the people themselves, their speech, their houses, their habit as they lived; might show us the unmistakable beginnings of the nation. For there, we are persuaded, around tables spread with the frugal comforts of life and about family altars made sublime by simple faith in God and man, was begun the mighty work whose outcome is the permanent self-government of this vast continent.

I stood the other day in the museum of the library of the State Department and read over again the rude manuscript, in the handwriting of Mr. Jefferson, of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence, with its curious erasures and interlineations. In the same case, right by the side of it, also in the handwriting of Jefferson, is a clumsy drawing of the monument which he desired to have erected to his memory, together with the inscription which he would have written upon it. He wished to be remembered as the author of the Declaration of Independence, of the statute of Virginia for religious freedom, and as the father of the University of Virginia. But most of all he desired posterity to know him as the author of the Declaration of Independence—a title surely to an immortality such as belongs to only a few of the great names of history.

It would be an idle thing for anybody to try to take away from Jefferson the renown of that handwriting. It certainly would be a grievous offense against the truth to try to take it away from Jefferson, as a famous orator of our times, now dead and gone, has sought to do, and give it to Thomas Paine or to any other man. Yet there is a grim significance in the fact that time in dealing with the engrossed copy of the Declaration of Independence has carefully preserved every letter in every line of the instrument itself, and at the same time with a gentle hand has rubbed out the name of every one of the illustrious group of statesmen whose signatures authenticated the instrument in the archives of the Continental Congress. Even the name of John Hancock, which scrawled across the page so that the King's ministers might not fail to see it, has faded to an indistinct impression upon the parchment, while not even a slender outline is visible of the hardly less noted name of that delegate from the province of Maryland who was supposed, until the higher critics got hold of his biography, to have added to his signature his post-office address, so that the King's hangmen should not get hold of the wrong member of the Carroll family.

It may be an idle fancy, but I have sometimes thought that this strange disappearance of these historic names illustrates in a mysterious sort of way the real origin of the Declaration, not in the signatures of a few men, but in the minds and hearts and united purposes of the people of all the colonies. It ought to be remembered that the war for independence was well under way before the Congress which framed the Declaration of Independence had fairly entered upon its work. Many of the colonies, like Maryland, under the leadership of her Hansons and her Carrolls, had long before declared their independence. Concord, and Lexington, and Bunker Hill had all been fought; Charlestown and Norfolk had been burned to ashes by the British troops; the startled garrisons of the Canada frontier, whatever their opinions of the Continental Congress, had gracefully acquiesced in the will of the Great Jehovah as interpreted by the Green Mountain Boys; Washington had been appointed commander in chief of all the American forces, and Lord Howe, correctly measuring the genius of the great soldier, had already evacuated Boston. So that the Declaration of Independence was in no sense a declaration of war and hardly even a proclamation of hostilities already begun. It was an instrument which simply put down in writing what for generations had been taking shape and gathering force about quiet firesides throughout the British possessions.

The colonies were one hundred and fifty years old, and while they were English in name and never ashamed of their heritage, there was not in them any deep-seated attachment to the British Crown. Indeed, there never had been any such attachment among those classes of the English people out of which the most of the American immigration had come. The distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] has referred to the speech of the Earl of Rosebery at the time of his inauguration as the lord rector of the University of Glasgow, when he took occasion to say that an enlightened colonial policy in the eighteenth century would have prevented the dismemberment of the British Empire. There may be possibly a sense in which this is true. It is at least certain that such a colonial policy as prevailed in England in the eighteenth century, and in Spain up to the end of the nineteenth, would have left the British throne without the loyalty of a commonwealth of Englishmen anywhere in the world. If I correctly remember Lord Rosebery's words on that occasion, he suggested that if the elder Pitt had remained in the House of Commons and had kept the counsel of the King, a way would have been found to make a settlement of the problem consistent with the integrity of the Kingdom.

Possibly that would have been so; at any rate, it is certain that our fathers could speak no such words for themselves as were spoken for them in the Parliament of England by Edmund Burke and the Earl of Chatham. I have no lack of appreciation of the enchanting dream, to which the Senator has referred, in which Lord Rosebery relates what might have happened if the King's subjects in America had held fast to their allegiance. In his vision he sees them increasing and multiplying as the United States has increased and multiplied, their representation in the House of Commons gradually outnumbering the membership at home, until at last there would have appeared a strange spectacle—the Queen, led by her ministers and followed by both Houses of Parliament, with pomp and ceremony, transferring the capital of the Empire from London to New York or Chicago, leaving the old capital only a museum of political antiquities, a mere military outpost in a world-wide British Empire.

It may be an ungracious thing to disturb an hallucination so splendid, but for all that it is a vision of the day, for it is impossible to imagine a parliamentary wisdom able to prevent a free English race from taking possession in their own name of the continent they had won from the wilderness; and it is harder still to conceive of a statesmanship equal to the task of turning aside the purpose of God in ordering the destiny of the New World. I have said that the independence of America originated not with the leaders of the people, but with the people themselves. So that it is literally true that members of the Continental Congress, who, like Charles Carroll, shared in the proceedings only long enough to sign the Declaration, weeks after it had been framed and passed, lose nothing of their claim on the gratitude of mankind from the fact that their participation in the national movement was mainly in the quiet neighborhoods where they lived and among the people with whom they conversed from day to day.

American independence was first of all declared in the churches, in the newspapers, in the courts of law—in the churches in 10,000 sermons based upon texts taken from the militant literature of the old Jews; in the newspapers wherever a free press had been set up, as it had been in Maryland from the first settlement of the province down to the time when Charles Carroll, under an assumed name, leaped into distinction as an advocate of the national cause in a series of controversial letters; in the courts of law wherever the obnoxious acts of Parliament were brought in controversy. Indeed, there is a sense in which the independence of America may be said to have originated in the court-houses of Massachusetts and Virginia and to have been first declared by the attorneys at law in the ordinary practice of their profession. It is interesting if not instructive, in view of the manifold popular prejudices which have beset the learned occupations of the bar in after generations, to recall the beautiful harmony which once existed between the embattled farmers and the lawyers of that day with their quillets, their cases, their tenures, and their tricks.

John Hancock was an important citizen of Boston, possibly the most important, and just after the passage of the stamp act he imported into that town a cargo of Madeira wine, of which, it would appear from the record, our fathers were accustomed to take a little for their stomach's sake and their often infirmities; and owing to the universal feeling which everywhere prevailed against the stamp act, Mr. Hancock felt at liberty to unload his cargo in the night without going through the formality of paying the duties required by law. But as soon as the revenue officers found it out they brought an action against him to recover the delinquent taxes, and he hired a Boston lawyer by the name of John Adams to defend him. Now, Mr. Adams, according to the custom of the day, was keeping a diary, and his entries in the little book about this time are very entertaining. For example, "Sunday, at home with my family, thinking."

If Mr. Adams, after the manner of the modern practitioner, had charged Mr. Hancock for lying awake at nights thinking about his case, the latter patriot would not have had money enough left to reach the Philadelphia Congress, of which he had already been elected a member, for a similar entry repeatedly appears in the diary. For example: "Christmas; at home; thinking, reading, searching concerning taxation without consent." It was an epoch-making case, and John Adams went into it like Peter the Hermit preaching the first crusade. It was not a question of fact; it was a grim and momentous question of law. What Mr. Adams said is fortunately preserved. "My client, Mr. Hancock," said he, "never consented to it. He never voted for it himself and he never voted for any man to make such a law for him." There is the first half of the American Revolution in one sentence. That case never came to trial. They took a good deal of testimony, and it was continued from time to time, but never brought to a final judgment, because the next spring, along about the middle of April, it was settled out of court by the battle of Lexington.

In the meantime some curious litigation was going on in one of the Southern colonies. By the original charter of Virginia the established Church of England was made a part of the civil establishment of the colony, and the salaries of the parsons, as in the case of other public officials, were paid out of the public treasury, in tobacco, which was the standard of value of the time. In the depression of business which followed the French and Indian war there was a universal demand for the retrenchment of expenditures, which took the form, as it commonly does in such cases, of a reduction of official salaries. They cut them all down, including the salaries of the parsons, which were made payable no longer in tobacco, unless it were reckoned at 2 pence a pound.

As long as that was about the value of tobacco, everybody was satisfied, including the parsons, until tobacco rose considerably, when they began to see the difference and raised a clamor so loud that it finally reached the ears of the Bishop of London, who induced the King to veto that act of the legislative assembly of Virginia. The parsons took the position that the act having been vetoed it became void, and, being duly advised by counsel, they began actions to recover the salaries due them and withheld without authority of law. The judges, who were appointees of the Crown, very promptly and, from a superficial legal standpoint, very properly, decided that the King having vetoed the act it was void, and all proceedings taken by virtue of it without legal effect, and that therefore the parsons had the right to recover. But having no jurisdiction at common law to render a verdict sounding in damages, they took a test case and sent it to the jury to determine the amount of the recovery.

At this point there appears upon the scene a strange and now almost fabulous figure, the most marvelous popular orator who ever spoke our tongue, Patrick Henry, a young Virginia lawyer, with his first important case in court. Tradition relates that he was awkward and ungainly in his appearance, and at first halting and lame in his speech, but that as he warmed with his theme he rose to a splendid level of eloquence, and when he had finished had made for his name an immortal place in the legends of patriotism and liberty. What he said also is fortunately preserved. He denied the right of the English Crown to veto an act of the colonial assembly in a matter in which the colony alone was concerned. "When the King of England," said he, "in the interest of a privileged class, interposes the royal veto against an act of the assembly of Virginia in a matter relating exclusively to the affairs of the colony, he ceases to be a father of his people and degenerates into a tyrant who has forfeited all rights to obedience."

There is the second half of the American Revolution in one sentence; and that Virginia jury which patiently listened to the instructions of the court, quietly filed out into its retiring room without food or drink, water alone excepted, and immediately came back with a verdict for the plaintiff, assessing his damages at 1 cent, was far gone along the main road to the independence of the United States.

It was in the midst of little occurrences like these that we must seek the original draft of the Declaration of the Fourth of July, and nowhere among the colonies was this spirit of manly resistance more universal than among the people of the province of Maryland, where the Carrolls and the Hansons had for years given the weight of their names and the influence of their fortunes to the aspirations of the community toward a larger and a truer national life.

That aspiration found its first expression in an outburst against wrongs no longer tolerable; but if the grievances of the colonies had been the only cause of the Revolution, or even its most important motive, the opportunity was never lacking to settle the dispute on the basis of a full concession of all American claims. In fact, long before the war was over every objectionable act of Parliament had been repealed and every reasonable complaint redressed, so that it may be properly said that underlying all the abuses against which our fathers protested, and deeper than all the blunders of the King's ministers in dealing with men of their own race, lay the profound and intuitive purpose of the people to create a government of their own and to take into their own keeping the principles of civil liberty, which were already a part of their inheritance.

The ideal which for more than a generation had filled all American hearts was realized in a measure when Charles Carroll of Carrollton put his name down on the solemn parchment, in a larger measure when John Hanson, five years later, took his seat as President of the United States in Congress assembled, and in full measure at length when Washington, a deputy from Virginia, assumed the chair as President of the Convention which framed the Constitution.

For unless a government had been organized out of the chaos which followed Yorktown the war for independence would have enslaved the country and not made it free. These three charters—the Declaration, the Articles of Confederation, and the Constitution—have come down to us scarred, but not disfigured by the battles of more than a hundred years. The Articles of Confederation, whatever their defects, served their purpose while the war lasted, and though they illustrate the difficulty of founding governments and waging war at the same time, they stand as sufficient witness of that constructive genius which belongs to the English-speaking race.

The Constitution of the United States remains, in the words of Mr. Gladstone, "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man," while the Declaration of Independence, interpreted as it ought to be in the light of our national history, is still the most priceless treasure in the political riches of the world. The Revolutionary Government fell, under the enlightened criticism of the men who organized it, leaving John Hanson, its first President, so completely covered up in the débris that it required an act of the legislature of Maryland more than a hundred years afterwards to rescue his name from oblivion; while the Constitution which followed it had to lean awkwardly on the Farewell Address of Washington, the unrivaled common sense of Chief Justice Marshall, and the colossal intellect of Daniel Webster, until in the fullness of time the sword of Ulysses S. Grant gave it a fixed relation to the course of human events. [Applause in the galleries.] For in the last analysis the Army of the Potomac was the convention of 1787 under the head of unfinished business.

Over every field gathered the patriots of the Revolution, for history must associate with the men who laid the foundations of the Republic in blessed comradeship forever the unnumbered hosts of the volunteer army which answered the summons of Abraham Lincoln for the defense of the national life.

It can not be more important to be born than it is to live. The Constitution of the United States had hardly been ordained before a school of politics grew up which began to teach that any part of the country, when it so desired, could work the total wreck of our institutions by the simple expedient of withdrawing from any further participation in them. The doctrine, common to all sections, was an heirloom of the colonial period. In such a harness the colonies had gone through a century of Indian warfare and had sealed with their blood the independence of their country. It has sometimes been said that the doctrine of State sovereignty was the last desperate refuge of the slave power in America. On the contrary, it was the original fortress of public liberty in the United States. Our ancestors were only slowly habituated to look for the protection of their rights beyond the State which they could control to the nation which they could not control, and which they were only touched in a distant and unsatisfactory way.

That is exactly what Mr. Jefferson meant, in the days of the embargo, when he said: "I felt the foundations of the Government shaken under my feet by the New England townships." For, indeed, it was possible for an upheaval of local passion, or prejudice, or interest, to shake the foundations of the Government, during that long period when political factions were accustomed to enforce their decrees by secret hostility and even open conspiracy against the national life. It remained for a later and I soberly believe a better generation to measure without despair the chaos of civil strife, to walk into it, to fight the way of the people through it, to lift up a spotless flag above it, and in the midst of the flame and the smoke of battle to renew the covenant of blood made by our fathers, that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

After nearly a century of doubt and uncertainty some things, at least, have been made secure. Not very long ago one of our most honored university presidents was reported to have said that unless certain poorly defined ideas of his own in relation to the industrial life of our times prevail, within twenty-five years an emperor will be seated in the chair of Washington, while even in the Senate of the United States the anxiety, sometimes real and sometimes pretended, has grown familiar by repetition, that the Government established by our fathers has broken away from its moorings and is now adrift upon high seas, headed toward the rocks, nobody knows where.

We ought to keep company with no such opinions. They belong to the blackness of the darkness of a past generation. From 1865 forward to eternity, whatever else happens, the American Republic shall live—live to answer the accusers of the people, live to vindicate the faith of our fathers, live to send forth the light of civil liberty, to races not yet grown to the stature of freedom, and to nations yet unborn.

And not only has the Constitution of the United States had to contend with influences always adverse and sometimes malevolent in their hostility, but the Declaration of Independence has passed through vicissitudes hardly less perilous to its moral integrity. Mr. Jefferson originally wrote, "All men are created equal and independent." He then struck out the words "and independent," leaving our sublime political dogma standing nakedly there, "All men are created equal."

By that he did not mean that everybody comes into this world with exactly the same equipment of mind or body, or character, or estate. Our fathers, so far as I have been able to find out, were men of immense practical good sense. They knew perfectly well the differences which necessarily exist among men, arising from the nature of things. They had no quarrel with the framework of society. Their quarrel was with the abuses of despotism, the inequalities arising, not from the nature of things, but from the maladministration of governments. It was against these that they uttered the challenge of divine justice, "All men are created equal" in their right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

But even in that narrower sense the Declaration of Independence has had a hard time of it from first to last. For nearly a century the institution of slavery put the Declaration to an open shame before the world. Mr. Jefferson, though himself a holder of slaves, understood this perfectly, for in his Notes on Virginia, speaking of slavery, he put on record his own conviction on the subject, without ambiguity and without reserve, in these words, as portentous to-day as they ever were before: "I tremble for the safety of my country when I remember that God is just and that his justice can not sleep forever." And Washington evidently had the same view of the matter, for if you will examine his last will and testament hidden yonder, in the Library of Congress exactly as he wrote it, you will see that, among the last acts of his life, he manumitted all his slaves, tenderly making provision for those who were too young to work and for the infirmities of those who were too old, and adding a pious expression of hope that the odious institution might speedily pass out of the life of the rising Republic. It was a blot upon the character of the whole country, made respectable by the laws of nearly every colony, North and South alike. It did speedily pass away from most of the States. The climate as well as the conscience of New England was against it, so that gradually its influence narrowed within the territory farther south, where for generations it remained, cursing the black man and the white man alike, and illustrating in the end the infinite judgment of God upon every form of injustice against the hands that are hardened by toil and the backs of men bent under the burdens of society. I know that while that conflict was in progress there were some who claimed that our fathers meant to say that liberty was suitable for white people only; but when Mr. Lincoln, in the great debates of 1858, drove Stephen A. Douglas from that position, he used only the legitimate weapons of history and reason.

I can not believe that our fathers, after they had been commissioned of heaven to write, in the face of the kingdoms and monarchies of this world, our manuscript of equal rights—I can not believe that they deliberately put out of their calculations any men or any race of men. To believe it would be to impeach not only the integrity of their minds, but the sincerity of their hearts. I refuse to do either. On the contrary, the longer I live the more perfect my conviction becomes that there is in this world, after all, only one question of politics, and that is the question of equal chances for men and women to win in the race of life. [Applause in the galleries.]

Questions of war and of diplomacy, of peace and education become significant only as they are bound up together with the rights and welfare of the weary and heavy-laden millions of the earth. Toward the consummation of popular freedom human society has steadily approached. That universal conclusion will surely be obtained. Kings and royal families can not stop the course of history. The end is inevitable, because it is right, that this world of ours, so long the theater of ambition and the prejudices of rank and caste, of race and creed; of blood and privilege and wealth, shall one day in the coming era throw off the tyranny of all these and in their place raise up unto honor the enduring aristocracy of upright manhood. [Applause in the galleries.]

That is the message which comes from one century across another to us and to our children; and long as this stately building stands here on the eminence which Washington chose for its foundations these favorite sons of colonial Maryland, his friends and counselors, whose statues we unveil to-day, shall repeat the message in the ears of all nations and of all ages. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, materialism is ever crowding with increasing force upon sentiment. It is destructive of ideals As wealth increases and competition grows and larger opportunities intensify the struggle for existence or for great accumulations, unselfish sentiment becomes more distant and difficult. The war of the Revolution was, in its best and highest sense, inspired by sentiment and for a principle. Actual oppression had not reached that acute form which had precipitated other revolts. As Burke said:

> In other countries the people, more simple and of a less mercurial cast, judge of an ill principle in government only by an actual grievance; here they anticipate the evil and judge of the pressure of the grievance by the badness of the principle. They augur misgovernment at a distance, and snuff the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze.

The Continental Congress differed from all other bodies which have overthrown and created governments. All of its members were men of substance, who had nothing to gain, beyond the establishment of those principles of government in which they believed, and everything to lose in the contest. Carroll was the richest of the signers and the second richest man in the United Colonies. Washington was the wealthiest, his fortune being reckoned at $750,000, while Carroll assessed himself at a half million dollars. Hancock was the wealthiest man in Massachusetts, Morris in New York, and in each delegation was some one similarly situated in his colony. It was mostly an American convention. Forty-nine of the signers were born in this country, two in England, two in Scotland, two in Ireland, and one in Wales. They were all thoroughly versed in the principles of English liberty and in the rights of British subjects. They knew what they were entitled to under the great Charter and the Bill of Rights. Their average age was 45 years. The oldest were Franklin and Hopkins, who were 70, and the youngest were Rutledge and Lynch, who were 27. Hancock was 40 and Jefferson 33 years.

The proportion of lawyers to the whole number was numerically less and the doctors were greater than in any subsequent Congress of the United States. Sixteen were lawyers, 9 merchants, 5 doctors, 5 planters, 3 farmers, and 1 clergyman. The other 17 were, like Franklin, men of letters and of science, who had made their mark in various careers. Eighteen were graduates of American universities, 3 of Cambridge, England, and 1 of Edinburgh University. Twenty-one were liberally educated in institutions of learning in this country and abroad and by private tutors and travel. Eleven were self-taught, but they were by no means the least learned of their associates. Roger Sherman, who began life as a shoemaker, was a man of such transcendent ability that he was regarded in the Convention as its ablest lawyer and possessing a judgment to which universal deference was paid. None of them had any title, nor were they statesmen, as that term was then understood. They were the products of a self-governing people, who had developed, in the course of a century and a quarter, a habit of independence.

The colonial forces had learned the art of war and been the most efficient soldiers of Great Britain in the struggle on this continent with France. The signers were not seeking fame by speeches which would command listening Senates, for they sat with closed doors and without reporters. We know that the discussions were upon a lofty plane and carried on with universal ability and power. Jefferson bears witness that John Adams on the side of independence was a Colossus in debate. These fifty-six statesmen represented accurately the constituency which elected them. They voiced the sentiment of the vast majority of the American people. They were so conspicuous and influential that the British Government would gladly have rewarded them with the titles which are now so much coveted by the residents of the British colonies all over the world and granted to them as personal favor or distinction. They not only spurned these honors, but were conscious that if they failed in their revolt their lives were forfeited for treason and their estates confiscated. Two of them were already proscribed by proclamation as beyond all possibility of pardon if the colonies were subdued—Samuel Adams and John Hancock.

In other revolutions the violent men, the demagogues, those who had everything to gain by disorder, were in the main thrown to the front. With success came the struggle for power, and bloody proscriptions were as merciless and as general by those who succeeded in capturing the State against their associates in the Revolution as against the tyrants who had been expelled. This happened in the French Revolution, and has been the ordinary course of history in the South American Republics. But the signers of the Declaration of Independence never claimed for themselves any rewards of their countrymen for what they had done. None of them made any effort to seize the Government or to secure special individual favors. They knew what they were doing and that it was for posterity. Two of them became Presidents of the United States and one Vice-President, but the succession after Washington of John Adams and after Adams of Jefferson in the cleavage which came and lasted until the civil war between State rights and the nation were the natural choice of the free will of a free people.

Most of them were selected at different times during their lives for the diplomatic service, for Congress or the Senate, for the judiciary or the executive office in their several States, but they performed their duties as conscientiously and retired to private life as willingly as if they had never had any connection with the creation of the institutions which they served. Although their education had been local and their public life in colonial affairs, they commanded as diplomats the admiration of the oldest cabinets of Europe. The securing of the consent of monarchical France to an alliance, with the assistance of her fleet and armies, was a marvel of diplomacy, while the judicial decisions, acts of Congress, reports of Cabinet ministers, and state papers of the fathers has guided the course of Government from their day to ours and remain an unequaled monument of creative wisdom.

The course of Rome for many centuries was controlled by the mysterious revelation of the Sibylline leaves, but there was no mystery about the Declaration of Independence, no mystery about the Constitution of the United States, no mystery about the Farewell Address of Washington, and no mystery in the writings which have come to us from the fathers of the Revolution.

Forty-seven lived to see the independence which they had declared seven years before recognized by Great Britain. Forty-three hailed the new Constitution which was adopted in 1787, and which is our guide and government to-day practically unchanged. Happily for the country, three of them lived for more than fifty years after that eventful epoch-making Fourth of July. The influence not only of the teachings, but of the example of these surviving signers during the first half of our existence can not be calculated. The death of Jefferson and of Adams, occurring on the same day, on the Fourth of July, on the fiftieth anniversary of the hours during which the Declaration of Independence was adopted, brought vividly before the people the sentiment and the principles for which the signers stood. Their political antagonism had been forgotten in the last two decades of their lives, and in their union in death there appeared, as it were, on that memorable day spread upon the heavens in view of all the people the immortal Declaration of Independence; and on the one side Jefferson, the author, and on the other side Adams, the Colossus in debate, by whose eloquence it was unanimously agreed to.

Charles Carroll of Carrollton lived six years longer. He spent twelve years abroad, studying in the best institutions of England and of the Continent. His wealth and social position at home brought him in contact with the leading minds of those countries. He was four years in the Temple at London studying law. At the age of 27 he returned to his home equipped with every appliance of opportunity and of learning that the times afforded him. This was in 1764. The colonies were aflame with the discussion of taxation without representation. Carroll instantly jumped into the arena. His pamphlets commanded universal attention. To the royal governor of Maryland, who had endeavored to impose a tax not sanctioned by the legislature, he wrote this revolutionary sentiment and dangerous expression for a colonial subject twelve years before the Declaration of Independence: "In a land of freedom this arbitrary exercise of prerogative must not and will not be endured."

Ten years later and two years before the final act, conferring with some members of Parliament, one of them said: "If you revolt, we will send 6,000 veteran English soldiers to your country, who will march from one end of it to the other, for there is nothing with you which could resist them." Carroll's answer was: "So they may, but they will be masters only on the spot on which they encamp. If we are beaten on the plains we will retreat to the mountains." Carroll was not present when the Declaration of Independence was passed. Maryland had suffered little and was not feeling seriously the effects of the extraordinary exercise of the royal prerogative, so the Maryland legislature was reluctant to take the extreme step of separation. Carroll made it his mission as a member of that legislature to bring his State into line. Nothing could resist his impetuous patriotism and sound reason. He had more at stake than any of them, and he brought his State finally to withdraw its opposition and to authorize its delegates to sign the Declaration. Then with this mission, won mainly by his efforts, he went to Philadelphia and took his place as a delegate in Congress.

When the time for signing came, and in bantering each other as to whether in case of failure they would hang singly or hang together, the remark was made to Carroll, "You can escape, because there are so many Charles Carrolls." His answer, immediately emphasized by the inscription following his pen, was, "Charles Carroll of Carrollton." It is the only title in our Revolution. There have been many men of distinction in different ages and countries whose proud boast was that they had and could transmit to their descendants their name as of the duchy, the earldom, or the barony which had been bestowed upon them by royal grant for distinguished services or as favors of the Crown. But here was a distinction not bestowed, not granted, but assumed by the writer, not as a title of nobility, not as a claim, like the lands at Blenheim, to a great estate conveyed by a grateful country, but as the location and description by which the executioner could find him if the cause of liberty failed. The members of revolutionary conventions, as a rule, when the revolution was successful, have met with bloody deaths or been driven into exile. But the signers of the Declaration of Independence experienced all their lives that sweetest incense to a patriot and a statesman—the love and reverence and admiration of a grateful people.

A writer records a visit made to Carroll at his home when he was the only survivor of that immortal band. He was at that time 95 years of age. The visitor says that as he entered the parlor from a bundle of shawls on the sofa came a figure so slight and emaciated that it seemed scarcely human. But Mr. Carroll began at once to question him about the Virginia statesman from whom he had come and then to discuss the old days in the light of the new. That visitor, a man of imagination, cared little for what was said. He was grasping a hand which had signed the Declaration of Independence. He stood in the presence of the last of the immortals. There must have appeared to him the Congress in session on that great day. He could see Benjamin Harrison, of Virginia, seize John Hancock, who had just been elected President, and carry and place him in the chair, saying, "We will show mother Britain how little we care for her by making the Massachusetts man our President whom she has excluded from pardon by public proclamation."

He would see Benjamin Franklin calling attention to the fact that upon the back of the President's chair was a picture which represented the rising sun, the same chair which Washington occupied eleven years afterwards as President of the Constitutional Convention, when the sun of American liberty had risen, never to set. He would recall that then and there was the dawn of a new era in the affairs of the world. Constitutional liberty, self-government, the equality of all before the law, absolute religious freedom, and freedom of the press. These were new forces, which, if successful, must permeate all countries and affect the institutions of every land. Charles Carroll at 95, fifty-six years after he had signed the Declaration of Independence, could look back triumphantly at the results. He could see three generations of his own descendants enjoying its blessings. He had witnessed the perils of the Confederation, the cementing of the bond of union, and the creation of an imperishable nation by the Constitution of 1787.

As a friend and adviser of Washington he had taken part in that formative period of the first two Presidential terms, when the fabric was so feeble and tottering daily to a fall, and when it was held together mainly by the character and confidence of that foremost man of all the world, "The Father of his Country." He had witnessed the perils of a French alliance, which had been avoided, and seen the successful issue of a second war with Great Britain. His country was strong and prosperous. Every nation had its representatives at its capital. It possessed a powerful navy and mercantile marine, which carried its commerce all around the globe, its flag was on every sea and in every port, and the prosperity and happiness of its people were unexampled. There was but one danger, and that was acute in 1832—the danger of disunion. When the Declaration was signed, in 1776, the perils of the country were wholly from without. In 1832 they were entirely from within.

"One people" was the term used in reference to the citizens of the Thirteen United States of America in the Declaration of Independence. "We, therefore, the Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world, declare that these United States are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States," was the closing of that document. "That the people of the United States. in order to form a more perfect union," are the words under which our Constitution was written. Washington received his sword from the Congress of the United Colonies, and returned it when triumphant to the Congress of the United States. All who were born and all who accepted citizenship under that Declaration and that Constitution came into the inalienable inheritance of all the rights, the powers, and the liberties of the Union of the States. The danger to the Union from the conflicting ideas of State rights and nationality, which clouded the last days of Charles Carroll, culminated in 1861 into the bloodiest civil war of modern times.

That struggle it is now clearly seen was a providential interposition in our affairs, not only to extirpate slavery, but to perpetuate the Union. We witness the unprecedented spectacle of the victors and of those who failed, both fighting as our blood only can fight for an ideal, now sitting side by side in this Congress, equally loyal to the flag and to the Union. The passions of civil war have died while the generation which fought it is living. With this question settled the progress and development of the country in all that constitutes the wealth and power of a nation has been five times greater in the thirty-seven years since the civil war than in the preceding eighty-nine years.

We can place among the immortals John Hanson, who has also been selected by the Commonwealth of Maryland as her representative in the gallery of State patriots in this Capitol, as President of the Congress of the Confederation during the later years of the struggle, and he had appended to his name the unique title of "President of the United States in Congress assembled." As the signers, from above, note the honor this day conferred upon the one of their number who lingered longest on this side they recognize that, great as were their aspirations, fond as were their hopes, mighty as were their dreams of the future of their country, yet in every element which makes a happy people enjoying the blessings of the largest liberty and a nation foremost in the affairs of the world, the Republic which they created has surpassed all they hoped or dreamed or prayed for. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am unwilling that the exercises of this most interesting occasion shall close without any word being spoken from either of the four original States lying south of the Potomac. In the arrangements made for these exercises it was not designed that this should be so. Of these four States, if not of the entire thirteen, in Revolutionary times, Virginia will be recognized as easily the first.

And thus it was that it was deemed proper that a Senator from Virginia should be heard upon this occasion. It seemed to be peculiarly fitting that this should be so on the presentation of these two statues.

John Hanson was the first President of the United States in Congress assembled, and a Virginian was the first President of the United States under the Constitution.

Charles Carroll was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and the framer of the Declaration of Independence was a Virginian, while the soldier who made that Declaration good was also a Virginian.

Recognizing all this, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] had been selected to speak as the representative, in a sense, of these four original States. All will agree that no more happy selection could have been made. Unhappily, since these exercises have begun and within a few minutes just past, the information has been brought to us that the illness of the Senator from Virginia will prevent his being heard to-day, and, at this last moment, the duty has been unexpectedly devolved upon me.

Mr. President, I would not undertake at any time to supply the place of this eloquent Virginian, and in any event extemporaneous speech would not be fitting here to-day. But without attempting more than a word, I will be pardoned, Mr. President, for saying that the failure of Virginia or of North Carolina or of South Carolina or of Georgia to be heard to-day would be misconstrued, if from such failure it was understood that the fact that statues to John Hanson and Charles Carroll were to be presented here to-day had been passed over by them as a matter not worthy of attention or of speech from them; for it can be confidently said that not only now, but at all times since the date of the signing of the Declaration of Independence the people of those four States have been loyal and true to every utterance of that great instrument. They are not only loyal to its great principles, but they revere the memory of its great authors.

Mr. President, not only in sentiment, but so far as might be expressed in acts, the devotion of the people of these States to the principles of that instrument has been manifested, and they have united in the effort to do honor to those who framed that immortal instrument, and plighted their lives and fortunes to its maintenance.

Among other things, it may be mentioned that in my own State of Georgia there are a number of counties which have been named for framers and signers of the Declaration of Independence. I can not enumerate all of them, but I will mention as pertinent to this occasion that not only are there in Georgia the counties of Jefferson and Hancock and Franklin and Gwinnett and Hall and Walton, and others bearing the names of these illustrious signers, and named in their honor, but there is also in the State the county of Carroll, named in honor of the renowned Marylander.

Mr. President, if I may be pardoned the suggestion, as I have sat here and listened to these eloquent speeches I have noticed in the niches of this Chamber the busts of all the Vice-Presidents of the United States, and the thought has occurred to me that it would be fitting if at some time the Government of the United States would erect a hall for the immortals—the consecrated band who proclaimed the great Declaration which challenged the political dogmas of a thousand years, and defied the greatest military power of all the earth.

We have the Chamber of the old House of Representatives, in which each State is authorized to place the statues of two of its most illustrious citizens. But, sir, this work of thus commemorating these founders of the Republic should not be left to the States alone. The time may come when the old Senate Chamber will be vacated by the Supreme Court when a fitting building may be erected for the judicial department of the Government.

When that time comes, Mr. President, it will be fitting that that historic chamber shall be chosen for the hall of these immortals, and that therein shall be placed, to be forever preserved, the effigies in marble and bronze of the deathless framers and signers of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President, Maryland, one of the original thirteen States, to-day sends greeting to her sister Commonwealths and, as a token of her steadfast faith in the principles advocated by the immortal Declaration of Independence, places in the American Pantheon the statues of two of her most illustrious citizens of the Revolutionary period—Charles Carroll of Carrollton, to whose untiring energy and aggressive policy the adoption of the Declaration of Independence is in a great measure due, and John Hanson, who was the first "President of the United States in Congress assembled" under the government of the Articles of Confederation. The pages of her history are illumined by many names which shall live as long as the American nation survives or the records of its history are remembered. In peace and war, in the period of settlement, during all the mutations of fortune in the Revolution, in the adoption of the Constitution, in the progress of the nation, in the great civil struggle, and in the years subsequent thereunto unto the present she hath wrought her part through and by the heroic efforts of her sons. From among them all have been selected these two as being most worthy to represent her in the Temple of Statues at the National Capitol.

When the adventurous spirits—heroic mariners and commanders of Europe—in the sixteenth century sought, discovered, and explored the New World, in which they fondly imagined the fabled treasures of El Dorado might be hidden,

> They found not what they sought,
> But Fame with her bay wreath dowers
> The hardy band, for they found the land,
> And the land that they found is ours.

But, sir, in the century following the North American continent became the trysting place and haven of refuge of the oppressed of all European nationalities, who pledged themselves to liberty, religious toleration, and self-government. The struggles of settlement, the battles for British supremacy, are an important page in the annals of our country. The Puritan of New England, the adherent of Roger Williams, who founded the Providence Plantations, the Quaker followers of Penn, the Cavaliers of Virginia, the Catholic adherents of Leonard Calvert in Maryland, the Huguenots of the Carolinas, were unlike in many things, but the mainspring of their action was freedom, independence, self-government.

The province of Maryland was granted by Charles the First to Cæcilius Calvert, Lord Baltimore, bounded with much greater dimensions than now constitute the territory of the State. A number of counties in West Virginia, Delaware, and a portion of Pennsylvania were included. But with Lord Fairfax upon the one hand and the eminent Quaker, William Penn, on the other the boundaries were circumscribed and narrowed after many bloody encounters and valiant fights. Lord Baltimore held the colony as a feudal principality, but never viewed it personally, having delegated to his brother, Leonard Calvert, the rights of government. He was a noble, righteous, and liberal man, and under his leadership the colonists of Maryland "laid the foundation, broad and deep, of civil and religious liberty."

As it was in Maryland, so it gradually became in her sister colonies. The same aspiration was felt, the same environment sought, the same object contemplated in each and every one of the colonies finally dominated by Great Britain. New Amsterdam became New York; the Spaniards returned to the southland; the French, after a desperate struggle, were forced to abandon the mainland entirely; and thus in the passage of time all elements were consolidated under English influence and the British spirit of liberty pervaded the conglomerate mass.

The founders of the colonies sacrificed the civilization of Europe to avoid coercion, and their decendants were deeply imbued with the spirit of liberty. With the ax in one hand and the rifle in the other, they penetrated the wilderness, subdued nature, and conquered the aboriginal inhabitants. As they grew and prospered the English Government withdrew its protection and they stood alone. The American pioneer was forced to do battle for himself against a savage foe, and also to combat the enemies of Great Britain. This taught him self-reliance, to seek his own and his fellow-colonists' counsel, and gradually to form a bond of union in which mutual friendship and reciprocal aid were the component parts. There was no recognized right to form alliances among themselves, but in consequence of the similarity of their interests, laws, and at times precarious situations, they frequently united to advance the common welfare and for defense against the Indians. Finally in 1754 a Colonial Congress was held in Albany, at which delegates from seven colonies were present. It was resolved "that a union of the colonies is necessary for their preservation, and Parliament should establish it." It was not, however, until the mother country began its tyrannies and oppressions that such a union was consummated. The bold stand taken by the people of Massachusetts was approved and applauded by the other colonial legislatures, and a national feeling was manifested.

When, in 1775, the first clash of arms came in Massachusetts, a Continental Congress had already assembled, of which Peyton Randolph, of Virginia, was made the President. A year later the second Congress, having passed beyond petitions and bills of right, advanced to the supreme step of severing relations with the mother country, and announcing to the world a doctrine in governmental affairs as different to that which had preceded it as the new dispensation of the Nazerene had been in comparison with the Mosaic law. During the Middle Ages and even in modern times the feudal tenure had prevailed in Europe. There was mastership and service. The common people were serfs, the nobles held power by force, the monarchs of the kingdoms and empires ruled by right of descent and the grace of God.

The Declaration of Independence reversed these ancient methods, denied the usurped powers, and proclaimed the right of men to govern themselves by their own consent. Kingship was abolished, nobility and its titles discarded, and a simple government of the people, through representatives chosen by themselves, assumed control in their stead.

The colony of Maryland had been in sympathy with the opposition to the encroachment of Great Britain upon what the colonists considered their "inalienable rights" and had participated in the first Continental Congress, had answered the call of Massachusetts for assistance, and the riflemen of Allegany, with other component parts of the Maryland Line which was afterwards to become famous as the army of salvation upon at least two occasions, when desperate battles were fought, had been sent forward to aid the colonists of New England.

They were, however, a conservative people; they were a proprietary colony in contradistinction with those of a provincial character or charter government. Men of great landed estates, always careful, were not willing to advance in rapid strides, and they deemed in the Maryland convention, which appointed its delegates to the Continental Congress in 1776, that the time for separation from the mother country had not yet come. Therefore Samuel Chase and his colleagues sent by Maryland as delegates to the Continental Congress were restricted in their powers and instructed to vote against the adoption of the Declaration of Independence upon the part of the Maryland colonists.

It was at this point that the eloquence, ability, patriotism, and aggressive nature of Charles Carroll and the conservative but steadfast character of John Hanson united and intervened and threw the weight of the influence of their native colony upon the side of those who sought for separation from Great Britain and the establishment of the Republic.

Charles Carroll of Carrollton was born September 8, 1737, at Annapolis, in the colony of Maryland, which city was then not only the capital of the colony, but the center of wealth, power, culture, and social influence of the colonies of the South. His family was the richest in Maryland and potent in fashioning the course of events in that domain. They were of the Catholic faith and Jacobite in their tendencies. Charles Carroll was, at the age of 8 years, sent to France to be educated in the religious colleges of that country. At the age of 20 he departed from France and became a student at law at the Temple, in the city of London, England, where he remained for eight years, and at the end of that period was probably one of the most highly educated and cultivated men born in the colonies, for, in addition to the advantages that had been given him, he added a strong character and splendid intellect. At the age of 27, after an absence of twenty years from his native land, he returned to Maryland, and by reason of his powerful family ties, his great wealth, but, above all, on account of superior ability and a mental equipment exceeded by none of his countrymen, he at once took high station among them and began his career in the practice of the law and the management of his estates.

In the year succeeding his return to Maryland the odious "stamp act" was passed. It touched every fiber in his nature and at once ignited into a bright flame the latent fire of his patriotism. He was in the front rank of those who boldly and courageously protested at this iniquitous legislation of the mother country and pledged himself to resist the execution of the infamous law.

In 1774 the delegates to the Maryland assembly passed a resolution declaring that no more tea should be imported into that territory. In contravention of this resolution, in the year of its adoption a brig load of this article arrived in the port of Annapolis. Intense excitement at once manifested itself. The Peggy Stewart was ready to discharge her cargo, but the noble woman in whose honor the vessel had been named, herself an ardent patriot, by an appeal to Charles Carroll prevented the consummation of the project. When his advice was sought as to what it was proper to do under the circumstances, he replied with promptitude and decision, "If you would allay the rage of the people, burn the vessel together with its contents." It was not many hours afterwards when a great concourse of people assembled upon the water front saw the bright light of a conflagration, which burned the vessel to the water's edge, and there went up a great shout of patriotic satisfaction.

In 1776 Charles Carroll was appointed a commissioner, with Benjamin Franklin, Samuel Chase, and John Carroll, to induce the inhabitants of Canada to join with the thirteen colonies in their antagonism to British tyranny. This mission was unsuccessful. Influences which it would be futile to mention in the present caused the Canadians to refrain from uniting with the American revolutionists in their great struggle for liberty.

On his return to Philadelphia, Carroll found that the Continental Congress was engaged in debate and discussion upon the proposition that not only should there be resistance to the unjust taxation of the British Parliament, but that the colonists had now reached a vantage ground upon which they should assert their independence of English rule. Carroll found that Chase and his colleagues, who had been chosen to represent Maryland, would be unable to vote for this Declaration, by reason of instructions which had been placed as a restriction upon them by the assembly which gave them their credentials.

In a moment his mind, which was quick of perception, saw the danger of this opposition, for the action of the Maryland delegates in refusing to sign the instrument might have a fatal effect upon its intent and frustrate its purpose. The national sentiment had reached its height. The moment for decisive action had arrived. In order to make the action of the Congress effective it must be unanimous, and therefore Carroll, with a celerity in those days unprecedented, journeyed to Annapolis. In haste he proceeded to the convention, and with resolute demeanor, while it was yet in session, entered the chamber, procured recognition, and at once began the delivery of an address which seems an inspiration; so forceful in its nature was it that he procured a repeal of the instructions, and on that day, the 28th of June, prevailed upon the convention to send new instructions to the delegates at Philadelphia, abrogating those formerly issued and directing them to vote for the Declaration.

In the first days of July he was appointed a delegate to Congress, and notwithstanding his strenuous effort to reach Philadelphia in time for the passage of the Declaration, he was too late to cast his vote in its favor; but when the delegates were called upon to sign their names to the immortal document John Hancock, the President of the Continental Congress, asked him if he would sign it. "Most willingly," rang out the clear voice of Carroll, and he stepped forward and affixed his name; but as he did so some one suggested that it was an act for which possibly His Majesty the King of England might at some future time urgently require his presence, and that there were other Carrolls in Maryland. Therefore he again took the pen and added, "of Carrollton." "That the British King might know where to find him to answer for his treason." Thus we find that while Charles Carroll was not of the committee which drew that great state paper, while he could not claim authorship or inspiration as did Jefferson and Franklin, yet upon his action depended its acceptance and success.

During the great struggle which followed, which, indeed, had already begun, until its final consummation, Charles Carroll labored without ceasing. The friend and confidential adviser of Washington, serving in many capacities; in Congress, in the State legislature, ever faithful and loyal, ready and willing to give freely of his services and his means, that the Declaration for which he had pledged "his life, his fortune, and his honor" should triumph.

The Declaration of Independence is, in my humble opinion, the most important act of the American people. Its adoption was hailed with patriotic exultation by the colonists. Amid the peals of old liberty bell from the tower of the hall in which Congress deliberated freedom was proclaimed. It was the beginning of a new era in government. It not only gave notice to the world that the American colonies were, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, but it went further and beyond that. It declared that all men were born free and equal, and endowed with certain inalienable rights, among which should be mentioned "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Aye, it went beyond that, and it laid down resolutely and firmly the doctrine that all just goverment must derive its authority from the governed. The world was astonished; Britain was stunned by the blow; Metternich, the statesman of the old school, who was guiding the fortunes and diplomacy of continental Europe, laughed and said that "a government so founded must be ephemeral in its nature and would soon pass away by reason of internal dissensions." But his prophecy was vain; his judgment was clouded; for upon that Declaration was founded a new nation, conceived and born in liberty, fraternity, and equality, and it was the intention of the fathers, the framers, the patriots; it was the intention of Charles Carroll and John Hanson, as evidenced in many of their utterances, that America should not only have freedom for herself, but should inculcate liberty and advance, protect, and defend freedom for all the nations and peoples of the earth.

The Declaration of Independence is the grandest exposition of the noble heritage which of right belongs to a patriotic, liberty-loving people that has ever been penned, spoken, proclaimed, or sung by man. It is splendid in conception, magnificent in its dignified statement, majestic in its ever-increasing power, as it names, condemns, lifts up to scorn the encroachments, oppressions, and tyrannies of the English Government, and becomes sublime as it hurls its maledictions upon wrong, breaks the bonds that bound the colonists, and proclaims liberty to the world. It is not organic law, it has not the force of the Constitution in courts of law, but, sir, in the day the Declaration of Independence is not the supreme law in the hearts and minds of the American people the Constitution will be no longer respected and the national life will be endangered. Therefore it should stand first, sacred, inviolate.

During the same time that the Continental Congress was employed in fashioning and adopting the Declaration of Independence there was also appointed a committee to formulate a plan of government for the union of the thirteen colonies into a league for the mutual protection and defense, that they might in union wage war upon Britain and achieve a common independence. These articles do not evidence the same high spirit that was manifested in the Declaration. Rival interests, sectional differences, various contentions which had been forgotten in the lofty and noble patriotic enthusiasm of the Declaration were plainly seen in the twenty articles which were reported to the convention. After the adoption of the Declaration a long struggle took place upon these Articles of Confederation. They were finally adopted by the convention on the 15th day of November, 1777.

The Declaration had dealt with the people of the United States. The Articles of Confederation dealt with sovereign Commonwealths, and here we find the beginning of the two ideas which fought for supremacy from the first hour of our appearance in the arena of nations until the end of the great civil war—the one for Federal supremacy, the other for State sovereignty.

These Articles of Confederation were ratified in July, 1778, by delegates from all the States in the Union save three. They were subsequently signed by New Jersey on November 25, 1778, by Delaware February 22, 1779, and Maryland March 1, 1781. It will be seen that the State of Maryland was the last to give adhesion to the plan of the Confederacy. The reason for her long and strenuous opposition was that John Hanson and Daniel Carroll, of her delegates in Congress, assumed a position upon the question of the Western domain which was at length successful and which time has demonstrated to have been supremely wise.

Beyond the confines of the original States lay the great "Northwest Territory." Several of the Commonwealths claimed extravagant area because of the ill, or rather undefined, boundary. Maryland refused to ratify unless these claims were surrendered, for she contended that the vast tracts of land rescued from the common enemy by mutual effort should be common property and inure to the benefit of the National Government. This position was maintained for five years. Hanson and Carroll labored assiduously to remove the impediments existing, and at length succeeded in arousing the other States to a sense of the importance of the question and effected a compromise. Thereupon they were empowered to sign the ratification for Maryland.

After these years of struggle we find Maryland, though the last of the States to accede to the proposition, gave her assent to the ratification of the Articles of Confederation graciously and gladly on March 1, 1781, and made plain the way for the beginning of government under the Confederacy. The Revolutionary or Provisional Congress passed away. In its stead the new Congress, under the government of the Confederacy, was convened on March 2, 1781, under the title of "United States of America."

Under this plan of government there is what may appear to us now a strange condition. There is absent every particle of executive power in this Confederacy; the Congress is the legislative power, and in truth the only governing power recognized in the Republic. The reason for this is, to the student of history, very plain. The patriots of the Revolution had so long suffered from executive power as imposed by Parliament and practiced by royal governors that they detested and despised it, and would have none of it in the General Government. The States themselves had their governors and legislative bodies, but the Federal Government was devoid of executive power, except so far as the Federal Legislature by its own acts assumed them under the articles and executed them through its President.

Upon the assembling of Congress, under the new Articles of Confederation, on the 2d of March, 1781, John Hanson was present as a delegate from Maryland. He was born in Charles County, southern Maryland, in the year 1715, and was therefore at this period fast approaching the time which is allotted to men by the patriarch—three score and ten—yet he was as active as ever in the great struggle for independence. Years had not diminished his ardor nor lessened his devotion to the cause. He was descended from a family who originally dwelt upon the eastern shore of the State, in the good old county of Kent. His was one of the most influential families in the province. His personality stands in direct contrast with that of Charles Carroll. His education was obtained in the land of his nativity, not in foreign countries. His occupation was that of a Maryland landowner, a tiller of the soil, dwelling amidst his large plantation; a Protestant in faith, and, naturally, an adherent of the house of Hanover.

In early manhood he began, by reason of his position, to take great interest in the affairs of the colony. He represented Charles County in the lower house of the assembly in numerous sessions, and in the exciting times when the oppressions of Great Britain upon the colonies augmented from year to year he participated with thoughtful conservatism, which gradually developed—not by passion, but by reason and principle—into a determined opposition to the mother country. His fame spread throughout the province, and he ranked high among the accepted leaders of the movement for resistance. He was among the strongest and stanchest advocates of the "Maryland associations," and was among the first to sign the agreement obligating himself, "by the sacred ties of honor and reputation, not to import nor purchase any article thus taxed or which should thereafter be taxed by Parliament for the purpose of revenue," and he was the first in Charles County to openly compel the reshipment of goods sought to be imported.

In 1773 the march to the westward had already begun, and Frederick County, which has proven to be one of the richest agricultural districts in the United States, began to attract prominent settlers. John Hanson was in the vanguard of the march of the new pioneers and settled in Frederick County in 1773. Already well known as a leader in the State, his activity was transferred from Charles to Frederick County. In 1774 he was appointed a delegate to the General Congress at Annapolis and also elected a member of the committee of observation for the colony. He was active in organizing the Maryland Line, and contributed freely from his means, not only to his own State government, but it is recorded of him at this time that he sent £200 sterling for the relief of the poor of Boston, then suffering by reason of British invasion. Thenceforward we may trace his history, ever in the forefront, serving in various capacities upon committees and in assemblies.

In 1775 the Maryland convention issued its declaration of independence, known as the "Association of Freemen of Maryland." This meant the downfall of the proprietary government and the assumption of power by the provisional government of the people themselves. Matthew Tilghman was the president of this convention, and John Hanson one of its most distinguished and forceful members. During his chairmanship of committee of observation in Maryland, which practically governed the colony, the attempt of Lord Dunmore and his fellow-conspirators to destroy Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania by fire and sword was discovered and frustrated. When Maryland had ceased to be a province and became a State under its own constitution, John Hanson was again a member of the general assembly, and in 1779 was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress. In November, 1780, he was reelected to the general assembly of Maryland, but declined the honor and resigned his office, he being at the same time a member of the Continental Congress from his State.

Here it may be remarked that when he resigned his office he said to the people of Frederick County that the best man they could send in his place was Thomas Johnson, the famous first governor of Maryland when she was free.

On November 28, 1781, John Hanson was reelected to Congress for his third term, and with Daniel Carroll subscribed to the ratification of the Articles of Confederation for his State.

The organization of the new Congress began, and John Hanson, of Maryland, was chosen as President, and thus became "President of the United States in Congress assembled," occupying that exalted position until 1782, during the eventful period when the American armies, in conjunction with their French allies, finally triumphed, when beneath the rays of an October sun George Washington received the sword of his captive Cornwallis. The great labor accomplished, independence won, and the nation in its formative period, with every indication of advancement and success, John Hanson, now a man old in years as well as high in honors, retired from public life, seeking seclusion and rest.

He was the first "President of the United States in Congress assembled," and his hand guided the fortunes of the new nation in the year which brought the final success of American arms, after a long period of vicissitude and changeful fortune. He was not a man of selfish ambition, but became active in the affairs of his native colony by reason of his love of country and steadfast purpose to stand by and for the right. That he loved home better than the arena of political life is evidenced by his correspondence with his nearest and dearest of kin. As we read some of these epistles written to his wife and to his son-in-law, Dr. Philip Thomas, of Frederick, we are impressed with the fact that only a high sense of duty kept him for five and twenty years constantly engaged in public service, and allowed him to retire only when his fondest hopes had been realized in the consummation of freedom and self-government for his native land. I trust I may be pardoned for presenting to public view an extract from a letter which was evidently intended for his family, dated at Philadelphia, September 4, 1782. He wrote as follows:

> As to my serving as a delegate in our assembly next year, I hope my friends will excuse me. I think the public can have no further claim to my services. I have performed my term of duty and they must give me a discharge. Retirement to people of my age must be most desirable, and I hope I shall enjoy it in the future without being censured for withdrawing from the public service.

But the effect of the arduous labors of a lifetime of constant effort in the great cause soon called him to a more lasting rest than that afforded by the seclusion of his estate, for on the 22d day of November, 1783, he passed out of this life into the future, where it is said "just men are made perfect."

Charles Carroll lived long beyond John Hanson. To him was vouchsafed a life filled with honors even in his declining years. The services which he rendered to his State and to the Union can not be too highly appreciated. The Articles of Confederation had been well denominated "a rope of sand," and the formation of a strong, lasting Union was necessary as between the sovereign States. Common oppression and mutual disasters had united them in a desperate endeavor to obtain freedom.

At the conclusion of the struggle the Army was disbanded, Washington resigned his commission and lived quietly at Mount Vernon; but notwithstanding his private station, he stood first in the hearts of his countrymen, and he was worthy of their high esteem. His patient endurance more than any other quality had brought final success to the American arms. It was reserved for him to do as great a service for his country in civil life as he had rendered upon the field. He it was who appealed to his countrymen to form a more lasting union by the adoption of a Constitution creating a Federal Government. His influence was necessary, he alone had the power of leading the various and conflicting interests of the colonies to this conclusion. Among the very first of the leaders in the various States with whom he had consultation was Charles Carroll, and through Charles Carroll Maryland was induced to favor a convention and assist in the formation of a Constitution and finally aid in its adoption. Thus he rendered to the State and to the Union service of supreme value. He served in the Senate of the United States under the new Constitution, for the adoption of which he labored valiantly and faithfully. Then in the senate of his State for a decade, and after that came retirement from public life, receiving in private station from his fellow-citizens the honors which were due to him as the first and greatest citizen of his State. The end of his glorious life came on the 14th of November, 1832, he having reached an age almost unprecedented among the men of his time, almost 96 years. He was the last survivor of the signers of the Declaration of Independence.

Such was the character, such were the services of the two Marylanders whom our statues typify as the best product of the manhood of our soil. They have passed away, but they shall be ever remembered, and their fame will extend into the distant future. Their influence has not ceased. True it is, the principles which they evolved and for which they struggled seem at present to be obscured by an eclipse. If it be so, would it not be well upon this occasion to call a halt in the fateful march, would it not be well to look backward, and, if necessary, retrace our steps until we may stand again in that altitude where our vision will become bright and clear, where the flash light of an indiscreet ambition, of a desire for "world power," for territorial expansion and colonial aggrandizement shall forever pass away, and in its stead we shall see again that light which led us for a century and a quarter in honorable history and glorious achievement as a nation? We shall march to the music of the song of the great Declaration for which Charles Carroll and John Hanson lived and labored throughout many years, and realize, as did they, that our strength as a nation depends upon the exemplification of the grandest doctrine ever promulgated to men—that they shall be free and govern themselves, under God, according to their own consent and pleasure. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I ask that an order be made that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] be permitted to put into the RECORD and into the account of the proceedings of this day, when published otherwise, the remarks he had intended to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] may be permitted to publish in the RECORD and make part of the record of this day's proceedings the speech which he had prepared and had intended to have made, but which he has been prevented from doing by sickness. Is there objection to the request. The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President, I ask that the concurrent resolution offered by my colleague be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the concurrent resolution offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS].

Minnesota, or either of them, their and each of their successors or assigns, to build a dam across the St. Croix River at or near the St. Croix Falls, so called, in said river, and all works incident thereto in the utilization of the power thereby developed: Provided, That the plans for the construction of said dam and appurtenant works shall be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before the commencement of the construction of such dam: And provided further, That said St. Croix Falls Wisconsin Improvement Company and said St. Croix Falls Minnesota Improvement Company, or either of them, their and each of their successors or assigns shall not deviate from such plans after such approval either before or after the completion of the structure, unless the modification of said plans shall have previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and of the Secretary of War: And provided further, That such dam and the appurtenant works shall be so constructed as to permit the free passage of saw logs without unreasonable hindrance and delay.

CARTER B. HARRISON

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 11139) granting a pension to Carter B. Harrison, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16990, the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16990, the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield fifty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, it is probably not out of place at this time for some one to call the attention of the country to the comedy in which certain politicians are engaged.

A very serious proposition confronts the Republican party. It is this: How far can it really proceed with antitrust legislation without injuring the trusts? How drastic a bill can it pass which will really be inoperative? How far can it proceed with the attack and yet leave its trust friends uninjured? Is it possible for it to do the Sherman Act over again? Can it fool the people a little while longer?

The provisions of all the bills which Republican ingenuity up to this time has been able to evolve may be summed up under two heads. First, the requirement of publicity in the management of the trusts; second, the inhibition against discrimination in interstate commerce. The first four sections of the substitute offered by the Judiciary Committee require publicity. The fifth, sixth, and seventh sections present the plan of the committee whereby discrimination may be prevented. The eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh sections provide machinery by which the law is to be enforced. The trusts do not appear to be alarmed at all at the proposed legislation, and, so far as appears, the legislation stimulates but little hope in the breasts of those who have suffered. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the bill is utterly inadequate.

It really looks, Mr. Chairman, as if the substitute bill were drawn to protect the trusts which are now oppressing the people, for upon its very threshold the bill exempts all of these lawbreakers from its operation. It provides "that every corporation which may be hereafter organized shall, at the time of engaging in interstate or foreign commerce, file the return hereinafter provided for." I do not believe that the publicity required by this bill will afford any substantial remedy, but it appears that a majority of the committee, for some reason, has left absolutely exempt from the operation of the bill all corporations except those which may be hereafter organized. What have our great lawbreakers done that they should be thus favored by the majority of the committee? Why should they be permitted to enjoy this advantage? Why should they be allowed to live in the shadow, while new trusts must live in the sunlight?

A favorite expression of our Republican friends is that there are good trusts and bad trusts. The majority of the committee has evidently observed this distinction. The old trusts are the good trusts. Those that are to be hereafter organized are the bad trusts. The old trusts may operate in the dark; the new trusts must operate in the light.

What will be the effect of this exemption? If your publicity idea amounts to anything, if it is of any real benefit to the people, if its effect shall be to force the trusts to comply with the law, then, in my opinion, it will be a long time before any new trusts are organized. Old charters will be bought in order that the law may be evaded, and it will be many years before any bad trusts will rise up to challenge the supremacy of the good trusts which you are permitting to live in the dark.

But what will your trusts care about your publicity requirement anyway? The good trusts, those that are to sit in darkness, care but little about the publicity of their operations. We know they water their stock. We know that nearly all of them are overcapitalized. Take as an illustration any one of the great trusts of the country. Many people already know—

Its name, date of organization, when and where organized, statutes under which it is organized, and all amendments thereof; if consolidated, the constituent companies, when and where organized, with the same information as to such constituent companies; if reorganized, name of original corporation or corporations, the law under which all reorganizations have taken place, with the same information as to all prior companies in the chain of reorganization; amount of authorized capital stock, shares into which it is divided, par value, whether common or preferred, and distinction between them; amount issued and outstanding; amount paid in; how much, if any, paid in cash, and how much, if any, paid in property; if any part in property, the kind, character, and location, its cash market value at the time it was received in payment; the name and address of each officer, manager, agent, and director; a true and correct copy of its articles of incorporation; a full, true, and correct copy of any and all rules, regulations, and by-laws adopted for the management of its business.

It would probably not be a very difficult task to procure substantially this information about any of the great corporations of the country engaged in interstate business. Some of the companies themselves do not hesitate to give much of it to the public. Some of the great newspapers of the country, loyal to the interest of the people, have already procured much of the information and have given it to the public. The people have a tolerably correct estimate of the trusts. Perhaps it would be well enough to require all of the trusts, the good and the bad, those who sit in darkness as well as those who are to sit in the light, to furnish such information in a sworn statement to a Government official. But the point I am making is this: The requirement of publicity does not accomplish what both political parties have promised to perform. Publicity does not strike at the root of the evil; it does not strike from the hands of the consumer the shackles which the trusts have put upon him. Everybody knows he is at their mercy. What does the trust care, so long as Congress leaves the consumer in its power? The publicity idea is not a very bright idea. It will not fool anybody. It is a makeshift. It is merely an effort to temporize with a great question, which will be regarded with contempt by the American people.

The anthracite coal strike began on May 14, 1902. It terminated on October 20, 1902, having lasted nearly six months. The miners demanded at first that wages should be increased 20 per cent. This demand was subsequently modified into a request that wages should be increased 10 per cent, and that a ton of coal should consist of 2,240 pounds, and that a man should be appointed by the miners to witness the weighing of the coal. In 1900, I believe, the miners had secured an advance of 10 per cent in their wages, but this slight increase did not cover the increased cost of living. From 1896 until 1902 the cost of living had increased nearly 50 per cent. Republican orators and the Republican press of the country during those years were constantly reminding the people of the unprecedented prosperity which the country was enjoying, and especially the laboring man. He was the especial pet of that party. The great Republican heart beat for him as for no other human being in the universe.

Ah! Mr. Chairman, they wanted his vote. But when the toiler, who spends most of his life in the bowels of the earth shut off from pure air and sunshine, demanded an increase of 10 per cent in his wages, and that 2,240 pounds should be received as a ton of coal, and that his representative should see that he was not cheated in the weighing of the coal, the trusts said "No, this demand is unreasonable. Republican prosperity has not yet reached this point. You must continue to dig, and dig, and dig at the same wages you received in 1900, and you must continue to dig out a 3,000 ton of coal and my representative, not yours, shall say whether the product of your labor is correctly weighed." Seven great railroad corporations control nearly 70 per cent of the total anthracite coal produced.

Under Republican protection there has been an enormous increase in the value of stocks in these corporations. Republican statesmen have been constantly congratulating the country upon the enormous increase in railroad earnings; but when confronted with the proposition to increase the wages of the miners 10 per cent, these corporations flatly refuse. As a result, 147,000 miners quit work. What then? Cold weather came on and with it great suffering. Anxiety was written upon the faces of the poor in cities and towns all over the country. Even food products were burned in order that life might be sustained. Churches, schoolhouses, and other public buildings were thrown open in order that the poor might not freeze to death. Even in Washington it was difficult for the Government to procure enough coal to heat its buildings. In Boston and New York coal went to $25 per ton, in Philadelphia to $24 per ton, to $20 per ton in numbers of places. Did anybody suppose that publicity would relieve this situation? Does the Republican party propose to answer this cry of distress with a stereotyped statement showing the officers of these seven corporations, the amount of their cash stock, how much money they paid in and how much property conveyed, the name and address of each officer, and a true and correct copy of their articles of incorporation? Do you gentlemen upon the Republican side think you can satisfy the moral sentiment of this country by any such subterfuge?

In the midst of all this distress what did you do? Did you then dare to say that your publicity law, this iridescent idea of your President, was sufficient? Not at all. But in the midst of it all you adopted a Democratic idea. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You invoked a great Democratic principle when you were forced to repeal the duty of 67 cents per ton upon anthracite coal for one year. You got that suggestion from the Democratic platform of 1900, which I will read: "Tariff laws should be amended by putting the products of trusts upon the free list to prevent monopoly under the plea of protection." Your President had said that there was no duty upon anthracite coal. He found he was mistaken, and with great professions of patriotism, flavored with tears of pity for the distressed, you came in here and admitted that in the extreme exigency of the hour the best you could do was to put coal temporarily upon the free list. Before I conclude I shall return to this subject with some further observations.

Now, what is the second remedy which our Republican friends offer? It is this:

That any person, carrier, lessee, drawer, officer, receiver, agent, or representative of a carrier, subject to the act to regulate commerce, who or which shall offer, grant, give, solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, concession, facilities or services in respect to the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce for any common carrier subject to such act whereby any such property shall, by any device whatever, be transported at a less rate than that named in the tariffs published and filed by such carrier, or shall receive any advantage by way of facilities or services, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not less than $1,000.

Mr. Chairman, this section is terrible in its impotence. Our Republican friends propose to answer the demand of the people of this country for relief by saying to common carriers, "You shall not transport articles of commerce from one State to another at a less rate than you publish." This is indeed a potent requirement. It is creditable to the conscience of the Republican party. This bill does not offer any plan by which these agencies of interstate commerce are prevented from putting up their rates as high as they see fit, but they become guilty of a crime when they haul articles of commerce at a less charge than they themselves have published. In other words, the Republican party says, "You must do what you say you are going to do; if you do not, you shall be subject to a fine of not less than $1,000." Another subterfuge, Mr. Chairman. No wonder the trusts are serene in their consciousness of perfect safety.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. POU. I do.

Mr. THAYER. You claim, as I understand, that the trusts will not be affected by this legislation if it becomes a law. If that be true, tell me why it is that the great defender and apologizer for trusts and combines at the other end of the Capitol has served notice on the country that this bill, impotent as it is, shall never be passed.

Mr. POU. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. THAYER. To the only one that I know who stands out as the great defender of these trusts and combines, MARK HANNA, of Ohio.

Mr. POU. Well, Mr. Chairman, it can be easily understood how that gentleman would object to any legislation which might affect the trusts, because, as I understand it, he has solved the whole problem by saying that there are no trusts. Therefore from his standpoint you can not pass any legislation which will affect the trusts when there are no trusts to affect. Evidently that gentleman thinks that we are engaged in a vain business when we are legislating against something which does not exist.

We then come to the sixth section of this bill. What does that section provide? The pith of that section consists in this: You say that none of the corporations subject to the provisions of this act shall be permitted to sell to one of their customers cheaper than they do to another, if the purpose of such discrimination is to destroy competition. Two things must therefore be established: First, a discrimination in price; second, that such discrimination is for the purpose of destroying competition. Probably it would not be very difficult to establish the first of these propositions, but every lawyer knows how extremely difficult it would be to establish the second.

How are you going to prove the purpose of the corporation? I do not understand our Republican friends to contend that they have the power to say to these corporations "You shall sell as cheaply to one of your customers as you do to another." In order to accomplish the result contemplated by this section it must be shown that the trusts have an unlawful purpose in making the discrimination. I fear that the friends of this bill will find its provisions as utterly impotent as the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law have appeared to be. I honestly believe that the trusts will not be at all disturbed in the flagrant oppressions of which they are guilty, even if the bill is enacted into a law.

The majority report of the committee shows great solicitude for investors in trust stock, but is silent as to the welfare of the millions who are forced to consume the products of the trusts. The person who owns stock in a trust is a part of the trust. The majority of the committee seems anxious to protect him. They feel sure publicity will do this, for even Mr. John D. Rockefeller advises publicity. Actually the majority of the committee have incorporated in their report the suggestion of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, "who," they say, "is understood to be at the head of one of the largest industrial corporations in existence." They say in this report that "even Mr. Rockefeller in effect advised publicity in his statement before the Industrial Commission." Then they quote the evidence of Mr. Dill, "who," they say, "has had very large experience in the organization of corporations, is the author of several works upon corporations and was the attorney organizing the United States Steel Company." (Italics are mine.)

These gentlemen approve publicity. Therefore publicity is efficient. It will correct the evil. This must be so, is the conclusion of the Republican majority of the committee, for Mr. Rockefeller, the head of one great trust, and Mr. Dill, attorney for another, advise it. Publicity is the means whereby the trusts shall be forced to do right, for the trusts themselves say so. This is the logic of the Republican majority of this committee.

Mr. Chairman, the great evil which menaces the happiness of millions in this Republic is not overcapitalization in the formation of trusts, it is not in watered stock, it is not in lack of publicity, it is not in discrimination among customers. Bad as all this is, there is a still worse evil, in the presence of which all this pales into insignificance. It consists in the power of the trusts to control the essentials of life and to fix the prices thereof. The great evil which will involve this country sooner or later in revolution, unless corrected, consists in the power of a single corporation or individual to control the food which human beings must have, the clothing they must wear, the fuel they must burn, the implements they must use, and the prices people must pay for these essentials of life. More than this; it consists in the power of a single corporation to control the market of the great agricultural products of our people, and its ability to fix the price thereof. When this is permitted men are no longer free.

We might as well face the issue squarely now. Sooner or later we will be forced to face it.

Now, by section 6 of this bill you say you have the power to prohibit the "use, either directly or indirectly, of any of the facilities or instrumentalities of interstate commerce" to corporations which shall attempt to monopolize or control production by allowing discrimination in prices, etc., in order to destroy competition. The able lawyers who drew the bill, therefore, admit that, if the public welfare demands it, Congress has the power to prohibit all interstate commerce to those offending against the welfare of the people. The bill is no doubt the product of much constitutional research. The air has been full of rumors, which have not been very strenuously denied, concerning the action of the Chief Executive in requesting one member of the committee to carefully investigate the trust evil. The assistance of the Attorney-General of the United States has been invoked. So we have the right to assume that the provisions of section 6 do not exceed the constitutional power of Congress.

Now, then, if this be true, you have the power to prohibit any corporation or individual, which or who shall acquire a monopoly of any of the essentials of life, from engaging in interstate commerce. Mr. Chairman, if our Republican friends will add a section including this provision and conferring this power upon some designated agency, it will stimulate some hope in the breasts of the people. It will be some evidence of an earnestness of purpose, and it will tend to contradict the impression that the Republican party is really the friend of the trusts and is simply trifling with this great question.

Mr. Chairman, why not resort to something that is practical? This is a great question, which should be approached with absolute candor and with the utmost sincerity of purpose. Its importance is so great that every statesman in the land should place its consideration far above any party advantage. I shall vote for the pending measure, but I have little hope that any material relief will be accomplished by it. Both political parties have promised the people, in the most emphatic terms, that they would do all in their power to strike from their hands the shackles of monopoly.

We all know that the wage-earner is at the mercy of the trusts. We know that the price of some of the great agricultural products of the country is absolutely fixed by the trusts. We know that, practically speaking, the trust buys at its own price and sells at its own price. No wonder that among the favored few millions are almost as common to-day as thousands were in the early days of the Republic. More than this. We know the trusts are charging the American people for their goods more than they charge foreigners for identically the same goods. We know that they are punishing us for making them rich. And yet we are protecting the trusts from all outside competition. Our folly has been so great that we have put ourselves in their power. Thank God the party to which I belong has done what it could to prevent this, but the Republican party has shut off competition from the outside world, and has said to the trusts and monopolies, "Here are 79,000,000 American people. They are your legitimate prey. Do with them as you see fit. They shall not buy goods from foreigners; they must buy your goods. Put your own price upon them. The prey is yours; do with it as you see fit." What is the logical answer to all this, Mr. Chairman? What does the conscience, the sense of right which God has put in the breast of every man, what answer does it give? It is this: "Remove the protection allowed by law to these great criminals; let them have the world to compete with; let the American buy wherever he can get his goods the cheapest."

If in the course of time the trusts shall monopolize the commerce of the world, humanity may be forced to deal with them in an entirely different manner. Why not remove the protection they enjoy by reducing the tariff upon the articles which they manufacture to that point which will force them to sell as cheaply to the American as to the foreigner? What has the American done that he must thus be punished? What has the foreigner done that he shall be permitted to enjoy this discrimination in his favor? Are not Americans as good as foreigners? Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Republican party found its only remedy in the extreme situation which surrounded us in the coal strike by suspending the duty upon anthracite coal, why will not similar relief be afforded in case the duty is removed or reduced upon other trust articles?

I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in which he informs me that cotton-mill and spinning machinery is dutiable at 45 per cent ad valorem. I also have a letter from one of the leading cotton-mill men of the country, under date of September 13, 1902, from which I will quote the following:

A carding machine can be bought in England from $375 to $400. The same machine costs in the United States from $600 to $750. Mule spindles cost in England from $1 to $1.25 per spindle. They cost in this country from $1.75 to $2.25 per spindle. Fly frames are in the same ratio. Ring spindles cost about $2 in England and about $3 in this country.

I merely mention this as one instance of discrimination.

My State, Mr. Chairman, is entering upon a great era of manufacturing. The day is not far distant when we will manufacture as much cotton as our State produces. Why permit this discrimination against us? Why allow an injustice to be done us? Why not allow our cotton-mill men to buy their machinery as cheaply as Englishmen? What necessity is there for continuing this 45 per cent tariff which the Secretary of the Treasury says exists? If you pass an antitrust bill which is worth anything nobody knows what the Supreme Court will do with it. That court may discover grave constitutional objections. But in the midst of all this dilemma we know that some relief can be given the consumer by reducing the duty upon trust-protected articles. Let us try this remedy. Republican State conventions have declared for it; common sense teaches it. You admitted it yourselves when you came in here and, in your desperation to do something, suspended the duty on anthracite coal.

The people are waiting, Mr. Chairman. The great rank and file are not blind partisans. They do not worship forever at the shrine of any political party. They love the flag; they love the country more than they do any political party on earth. [Applause.]

And, after all, political parties are but agencies. They are not masters, but servants. They have no right to dominate the conscience of any man. In perfect sincerity of purpose let us, the servants of the people, in dealing with this great question, attempt to do something practical for our country and for humanity. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy the time of the House but a very few minutes. When the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] was speaking the other day on the question of trusts, I interrupted him with a question. As a general rule I do not believe in that sort of procedure; for I think that a set speech of that kind is in general made by a member of the House for distribution among his constituents, and it hardly seems to be fair to inject a question for the purpose of embarrassing him. I therefore, at the close of the session, went to the gentleman and said that he had my full consent to strike out from the RECORD the portion which I had interjected. He did so, I assume. But I think it is due to myself that I should explain the statement which I made in connection with the question which I put to him.

The principal feature of his remarks to which I objected was the statement that trust-made products were increased in price by levying a duty against articles of like character imported into this country under the protective-tariff system. Having made a little investigation of that question during the last campaign, and having the facts in my possession, I asked him the question with the expectation that he would reply. He objected, however, to my giving my authority for my statement. During the last campaign I received the book which I hold in my hand, which is the Democratic campaign text-book. I examined it with much pleasure, as I do everything of that kind, especially any emanation from the brain of my friend and colleague in the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS], chairman of the Democratic Congressional committee. I found in that book a list of 185 articles the prices of which were given from 1896 down to 1901, all of them claiming to be products of trusts. It occurred to me in the examination of that list that possibly our genial friend from Georgia had "builded better than he knew."

So I went to work, and I took from this list which I have here all the articles which were named as being on the free list, and I was surprised to find, in view of the way in which the campaign turned out, that our friend at that time had put in this campaign text-book anthracite coal as being on the free list; so that we had good authority during that campaign for saying that anthracite coal was on the free list, for we found it—and I have it here in the Democratic campaign text-book—on the free list.

I took all the articles that I found, according to this statement which I have here, and which claims to be authoritative. I give this list as I find it on Democratic authority, both as to prices and duties and as to whether the articles are controlled by trusts. And in what I am saying I want it distinctly understood that I am relying solely on Democratic official authority.

Now, the articles that were on the free list in this list of trust-made products were anthracite coal, stove coal, broken coal, copper, flax, jute, petroleum (crude and refined), petroleum (150° test), rubber, sisal, and binder twine; and I took the prices from 1896 as given there and brought down to 1901, and I found that the average advance during those five years upon all of the free-list articles in the Democratic campaign text-book was 26 per cent, not including coal, for it did not seem to me it would be fair under existing conditions to charge the enormously increased price of coal during the strike to the problem which I wanted to solve, so I left that out; with that in, the advance would have been 74 per cent average on the entire free-list articles cited in the Democratic campaign text-book.

Now, then, I wanted to make a comparison with protected articles the products of trusts, and so I took twice the number of articles entering into daily consumption in the homes and in the construction of the homes of our American people, and the articles so taken were alcohol, brick, Boston crackers, cotton flannels, Rosedale cement, canned fish, ginghams, glassware, wire nails, cut nails, fresh beef, salt beef, salt pork, smoked hams. And I want to say right here that it seems to me that it was equally unfair under existing conditions in the provision market to put beef in here; but, desiring to give to our Democratic friends all the advantage possible, I left out coal on the free list and put in beef on the protected list; so that generosity (if it might be so characterized) was shown to our Democratic friends in making this comparison. Continuing the list, I find pig iron, rice, sugar, granulated sugar, Ashton salt, steel rails, and tin plate. I think this is a fair list of articles entering into consumption among the American people; and I made that comparison with the free-list articles as given in the Democratic campaign text-book.

The result was that I found that the products of trusts—the protected products of trusts—compared with the products of factories in this country on the free list showed an average advance of 15½ per cent as against 26 per cent of all the articles placed on the free list in the Democratic campaign text-book. So that it seems to me that a fair and reasonable conclusion that one might reach on Democratic authority, if that authority is good—and I used no other—was that the tariff had cut no figure in increasing the prices of these articles as shown by the Democratic campaign text-book. Now, there is one further conclusion I want to draw from this comparison, and I am citing this now for the information of our Democratic friends on the other side, who I presume have not perhaps as carefully as some others studied their own campaign text-book.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] the other day cited the great suffering which was inflicted upon the farmers of this country by the tariff upon the products of the United States Steel Company, citing especially wire nails and cut nails. Let me quote from the Democratic campaign text-book. Wire nails in 1896, before the enactment of the Dingley tariff law, according to Democratic authority, were $3.15 a keg, and in 1901, after five years of the Dingley tariff bill and after the organization and full operation of the United States Steel Company, they were $2.10, and have since gone down to $1.85.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman kindly state what the price of barbed wire was in 1896 and 1897, and what it was in 1901?

Mr. HILL. I think very likely there may have been an advance. According to Democratic authority it was 2½ cents a pound in 1896, and $3.10 a hundred in 1902.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Quite an advance.

Mr. HILL. But against the proposition of barbed wire——

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I want to ask the gentleman one more question. I will ask the gentleman if there are not 10 pounds of barbed wire used to every pound of cut nails?

Mr. HILL. I admit that.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Has the gentleman controverted the facts stated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] that these great trusts sell their goods abroad more cheaply than they do to Americans?

Mr. HILL. That question was not under consideration at that time.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. But I ask the gentleman now.

Mr. HILL. I am not discussing that question.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I ask the gentleman if he will not admit that they sell abroad more cheaply than they do here?

Mr. HILL. I am not intending to discuss that question. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. It is a fair question, I think, in this discussion.

Mr. HILL. I will answer the gentleman as soon as I reply to the first question which he asked.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I will ask the gentleman if——

Mr. HILL. The gentleman asked me if barbed wire is not a greater burden upon the farmer than cut nails. I say yes, Mr. Chairman. I say that it is. I am willing to admit that there is an advance in the price of barbed wire; but I say to the gentleman that that is on the protected list and the advantage is on his side; but binder twine is a greater burden to the farmer than barbed wire is.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Let me ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. HILL. Wait until I get through. Binder twine is a greater burden to the farmer than barbed wire, and I want to refer the gentleman to his own campaign text-book, that binder twine is on the free list.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. But before we leave the products of the steel trust——

Mr. HILL. Wait until I get through. I waited for the gentleman. Binder twine, according to the Democratic authority, in 1896, on the free list, was 6¾ cents a pound, and in 1902, still on the free list, was 14¼ cents a pound.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Now, I want to ask the gentleman another question about the products of the steel corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I do not yield until I have finished the answer to the gentleman's first question.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. He did finish that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HILL. Now, the gentleman first asked me a fair question. I am perfectly willing to admit that the comparison which I have made is on Democratic authority, but when I make that statement I want to say distinctly that in my judgment no logical conclusion can be drawn from statements made either on that side of the House or on this as to the result of the workings of the tariff on prices. Now, the gentleman has asked me a question fairly, whether I do not know that some articles are sold abroad for less than they are sold at home. Yes, I do know it; but I know that there are commercial and business reasons for it, and, on the other hand, I know that there are many articles sold abroad at higher prices than they are sold at home. But there are commercial and business reasons for that, just the same as there are for the other thing which the gentleman has referred to in his question.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Now, will you permit me to ask you another question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must address the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Connecticut permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHEN. I ask the gentleman from Connecticut if he can name half a dozen other articles, except nails, controlled by the steel corporation that have not greatly risen in price from 1896 until now, since the organization of the steel corporation and the trusts that preceded it?

Mr. HILL. Has the gentleman finished his question?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I have finished that question.

Mr. HILL. I will reply, and state that I have shown that every article on the free list, given by Democratic authority——

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I said controlled by the steel corporation.

Mr. HILL. Without exception, from beginning to end, averaged an advance of 26 per cent in the past five years, while the articles which I have stated, going into daily consumption in the United States during the same period, protected and the products of trusts, average an advance of only 15½ per cent. Now the gentleman can make his own explanation if he sees fit.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Evidently the gentleman did not understand my question. I did not ask a question about the relative prices——

Mr. HILL. I think the question has been fairly answered.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman did not understand the question——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I ask the gentleman from Connecticut to yield to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HILL. Yes; certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the gentleman's argument means anything at all, it means that, in his opinion, putting things upon the protected list has a tendency to lower their price?

Mr. HILL. It does not mean any such thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, I want to ask you this question in candor. I said if the argument meant anything. The gentleman has just said it meant nothing. Now, does the gentleman make the statement, or will he stand for the statement, that putting articles upon the protected list does not tend to raise their prices to the consumer?

Mr. HILL. I will not make the statement, Mr. Chairman, either one way or the other. I distinctly stated in the beginning, in response to the declaration of our friend from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] the other day, as to the suffering which was inflicted upon our farmers by putting a duty upon the trust-manufactured product of wire nails, that it was all imaginary, and that Democratic authority itself showed that during the past five years there had been a reduction of $1.30 a keg on every keg of wire nails, notwithstanding the Dingley tariff of 50 cents per hundred had been in operation all the time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Of course, I take it——

Mr. HILL. Now, I will admit to the gentleman from Mississippi, and he knows I will admit, that in many cases the putting on of a tariff increases the price. In many cases it has no effect, and, in my judgment, this was one of the cases. Any general question of that kind can not be answered yes or no. I will state furthermore, in reply to the gentleman who addressed an inquiry to me a moment ago [Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN], that the same general inquiry in regard to goods being sold abroad lower than they are here is entirely fallacious, that there can be no general argument advanced on that proposition. During the last campaign I was speaking in my own town, and when I finished and sat down—I had been discussing that very question—the chairman of the meeting, sitting behind me, said to me, "Mr. Hill, I have to-day received five orders from abroad, one of them $40,000 in amount." I said to him, "Are you selling those goods at a less price or at a higher price than you sell them at home?" He said, "We are getting a higher price."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, will the gentleman let me pursue the inquiry?

Mr. HILL. I simply give that one single fact against the general theory that is advanced in this Democratic campaign textbook.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to pursue the inquiry with another question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. From the Republican standpoint is not the object of the passage of a protective tariff bill to raise the price of the goods protected, in order to prevent competition from abroad——

Mr. HILL. I will answer the question of the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have not finished the question—so that from your standpoint American labor may possibly get a higher wage? And if it be true that the tendency of a protective tariff is to give American labor higher wages, must it not necessarily do it by raising the price of the article produced?

Mr. HILL. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that is a theoretical question which would require much more time to consider and answer than I design to take now. I simply introduced these figures based on Democratic authority, and now say to my Democratic friends that in the future in studying their own campaign text-books they may study it more wisely than it seems that they did in getting these figures together.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Only one more question.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Only one more question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to ask you this question. You have stated how prices were advanced on articles under protection?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. Then how can you stand here and claim that prosperity is due to a protective tariff?

Mr. HILL. I have not made any such claim.

Mr. MADDOX. How can your party do it?

Mr. HILL. I am not responsible for anybody else. I have simply gone and isolated a few figures from our Democratic friends' campaign book, in order that possibly I may induce them very quietly at their homes, after Congress adjourns, to study their own campaign text-book which they used during the last campaign. That is the only object I have in taking the floor, and that is all I intended to do, and all I want to do so far as that is concerned. I have got one other subject on which I want to talk——

Mr. THAYER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HILL. I do.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman has made a misleading statement in standing here and saying that in 1894 and 1896 nails were worth $3.15 while in 1902 they were $2.20. I live in a city where we manufacture nails, and in 1894 and 1896 cut nails were $1.40, and in 1902 $2.20.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman states I have made a misleading statement. I cited my authority before I begun—the Democratic campaign text-book. [Loud laughter on the Republican side.] I will refer the gentleman to page 373:

Nails, wire, eight penny, fence, put up in 100 pounds per keg, f. o. b. mills and Pittsburg, duty half a cent a pound, prices controlled by the United States Steel Company, July, 1896, $3.15; July, 1902, $2.10.

And if the statement is misleading, I refer the gentleman to JAMES M. GRIGGS, chairman of the Democratic Congressional national campaign committee.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman had no right, standing on the floor here, to make false representations, when they come from a source he believed not to be reliable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is not in order.

Mr. HILL. I am not responsible for it.

Mr. THAYER. You are responsible for your sayings here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is not in order.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I am not responsible for the inability of the gentleman from Massachusetts to comprehend the condition of things in general and the conditions as set forth by the Democratic campaign book. [Laughter on the Republican side.] He will have to reconcile them for himself. There is, however, another subject I desire to say a few words concerning. I will make no comment at this time. I shall transgress upon the patience of the House at some future time to refer to it. That is the question of a common ratio of the silver of the world. In my time I ask the Clerk to read an editorial written by, I think, one of the ablest economists of the country, certainly one whom every person will admit is possessed of full knowledge and ability as to the money question—Horace White, of New York.

THE NEW SILVER MOVEMENT.

President Roosevelt has asked Congress to give him power to lend the support of the United States to "such measures as will tend to restore and maintain a fixed relationship between the moneys of the gold-standard countries and the silver-using countries." This authority is asked without any suggestion, and apparently without knowledge of the fact, that a large part of our political and diplomatic activity during the past quarter of a century had been directed to that very problem—the problem, namely, how to cause two things to be of equal value when they are of unequal value. This was the underlying question in three international monetary conferences, and also in the Wolcott Commission of 1897.

The resemblance of the latter to the plan now recommended by the President, if we may judge from the accompanying documents, is rather striking. Mr. Wolcott and his colleagues went to England, not expecting to bring about any change in the monetary standard of the United Kingdom, but to induce her to lend India to some experiment for supporting the price of silver. The Salisbury ministry, being little skilled in the subject, and having very imperfect knowledge of the state of public opinion either in India or England, assented to the project, stipulating, however, that the single gold standard should be maintained in the United Kingdom, and stipulating also that both the United States and France should open their mints to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 15½ to 1. On those conditions Lord Salisbury, in the innocence of his heart and the paucity of his knowledge, agreed to recommend that the government of India should reopen its mints to the free coinage of silver, and that the Bank of England should keep silver in its vaults to the extent of one-fifth of its metallic reserve. When these facts were fully made known there was such an overwhelming protest of public opinion in both England and India against it that Lord Salisbury was obliged to say that he could not go on with the negotiation. It was a mortifying failure.

Yet the Wolcott commission had a much more promising start than any which could be set on foot now to accomplish the like task. That task, as we have said, is to make two unequal things equal to each other. It is so declared in the papers submitted with the President's message. The joint communication of the ministers of Mexico and China presents their wish in these words:

"It is desired that the governments of gold-standard countries having dependencies where silver is used and the governments of silver countries shall cooperate in formulating some plan for establishing a definite relationship between their gold and silver moneys, and shall take proper measures to maintain such relationship."

"Definite relationship between their gold and silver moneys" means holding the values of the two kinds of money at a parity. This may be done by one country for itself alone. Indeed, it is done by the United States at this moment. It is done by limiting the amount of silver money to the needs of retail trade, and compelling its use in such trade by abolishing other money of small denominations. But how this is to be done internationally, that is, by concert of action between a number of countries, we defy anybody to point out. The attempt to accomplish this end in the four or five countries of the Latin Union was a total failure. As soon as a divergence took place between the legal ratio and the market ratio of gold and silver, the cry of sauve qui peut was raised, and each of the countries concerned made haste to stop the coinage of silver. France limited her coinage secretly in 1873, openly in 1874, and stopped it altogether in 1876. The other countries were glad to escape in the same way from the agreement they had made to establish "a definite relationship between their gold and silver moneys."

Yet there was a much better opportunity to carry out this scheme in the case of the Latin Union than in the one now mooted in Washington. The Latin Union countries had a common currency at the start. They began with a legal ratio that was coincident with the market ratio. They were adjoining countries, territorially, and they were, in point of intelligence, the equals of any nations in the world. They were not the colonies of any other countries, and hence were not obliged to take their decisions from distant masters, whose action they could not anticipate. How different are the conditions of the peoples which it is now sought to link together in a monetary union. In the first place, the legal ratio which they wish to establish is that of 32 to 1, whereas the market ratio is far different and fluctuating violently. The countries concerned are certainly not of a high range of intelligence, and only one of them can be properly called self-governing. Mexico is self-governing, but China can hardly be called such. The Philippines are governed at Washington, the Straits Settlements at London, and Tonquin at Paris. A monetary union to be made of such a hotch-potch is inconceivable. We have had one foretaste of its difficulties in the disagreement at Washington on the Philippine currency bill of last session and again in the present session. However, if the wise men who have decided to make another silver experiment—a brand new thing never tried before, as they seem to imagine—let them go ahead. It will amount to nothing except the salaries and expenses of the commissioners, which, of course, we are able to pay.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire at this time to make any comment on the article or subject, but in order to save members of the House the trouble of preparing and looking up figures which probably they would desire to examine in the future when this question comes up, as it undoubtedly will this year, I will insert a statement of the world's production of silver since 1896, by years, and also the price of silver, calling attention to the fact that in 1896 the world's production was 157,000,000 ounces, and it has gone up steadily to 1901, last year, the latest statistics available, to 174,000,000, nearly 175,000,000 ounces; that during the same years the price of silver started in 1896 at 67½ cents per ounce, and has gone down until last year it was 52.7 cents an ounce. After asking that these figures be inserted in the RECORD, I leave the subject and return the remainder of my time to the chairman of the committee.

The figures are as follows:

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce the appointment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to act as Speaker during the ceremonies this afternoon, commencing at 3 o'clock.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself to a bill which I introduced a few days ago, which should be of interest to this House and the entire country.

It is a bill which provides that our postal service shall not be used by what is known as "wild-cat insurance companies."

A "wild-cat insurance company" is described in this bill as being an insurance company, whether life, fire, or marine, which fails to comply with all the laws of the State or Territory of its headquarters or its domicile.

The bill should be amended so as to force them to comply with the laws of the State or Territory where the risk is located when insured.

To be brief, and show you that such concerns are trying to do a so-called, but in fact a fraudulent, insurance business, I give you now, as I have stated heretofore, an example of how they operate. A B will go to New Jersey and get a charter. He will then go to Chicago and rent "desk room" and get him a directory of Nashville or New Orleans, Cincinnati, and all the towns in which he desires to operate, taking care to not operate—insure—in Illinois or New Jersey. He will sit down to his desk and with the most enticing invitation to the people, whose names he will select from the directory, write letters to them promising to give them cheap insurance. The face of the letter shows this is true, the face-value rate, perhaps, being cheaper than it is at the home of the subsequent victim. He will then write in some gilt-edged promises, "quick settlement," etc., in case of fire or death.

So that the laboring people of the country (the people who have no time to read the newspapers or to read the magazines and keep up with the sharpshooters of finance and insurance) will naturally be induced into insuring with this wild-cat concern. The humble and the ignorant classes are thus reached and victimized as a rule, a class of people whom we should be most watchful to protect and aid.

A B does not comply with the operating laws of New Jersey. He does not comply with the operating laws in Illinois, where he has headquarters—a desk, pen, ink, paper, and city directories as their stock or money in trade. He does not comply with the operating laws of Tennessee, or Kentucky, or Missouri, or of any other State where he insures. He simply gets the charter in New Jersey, goes to Chicago and proceeds, and uses the United States mail as his sale agent to practice his wild-cat scheme on the innocent and unsuspecting.

He dare not operate in New Jersey, because he does not comply with the operating laws there. When the authorities in New Jersey go to him and say, "Are you going to operate here?" he will say, "No, I am going to Chicago; I'll not hurt anyone in New Jersey." And he goes to Chicago. The State officers may come to him in Chicago, and to them he says: "I am not operating in Illinois; I am not insuring anyone here; I am insuring down in Tennessee and Ohio and Kentucky" or wherever he is operating, "and if I hurt anybody I shall hurt the people down in those States." So he pays in no money, creates no trust fund where he is chartered—New Jersey—and he does not comply with any operating law there.

He does exactly the same thing in Illinois; so when a man he insures in Tennessee, Kentucky, or Ohio dies and his widow and children want their insurance money, want the benefit of the hard-earned premiums they have paid, or when the little cabin burns down and they want to be reimbursed, there is nobody to sue in Tennessee, Kentucky, or Ohio, nobody in New Jersey, and if you go to Chicago you find a party to sue—if you find him at all; he proves to be good for nothing. He is all wind and water; no money "paid in;" no assets; no property—a bankrupt to start with in money and morals.

He started out to defraud if not to rob and steal. Certainly he gets the premiums by false pretenses by using the mails, which use and abuse of the mails ought to be prohibited, but the Postmaster-General does not think the law covers such a case.

He is, however, in sympathy with this kind of a bill.

So you see there is no agent anywhere. This one person or concern is the "whole thing," with the United States mail as his only agent by and through which this insurance is procured.

The State officer does not know anything about the transaction until a death or loss occurs, and then the poor fatherless or homeless victim goes to the fire commissioner of the State, who is powerless to act, to ventilate his trouble.

There is no bond filed or local agent, as the laws require, in all the States as a rule. No one to sue. No property if suit is entered.

The States can not reach such a case for the reason that the mail service is exclusively under the control of the Federal Government and not the States.

The insurance commissioner of the State can not interfere with the mails, can not stop the conveying of the mails, nor arrest a party who, if he knows, is delivering a letter from this robber concern to the unfortunate party who is insured, or whose house has been burned down, or husband has died.

Now, this bill provides distinctly that the insurer must comply with the law where his headquarters are or domicile is, and it should be amended, I suggest, so as to require the party to comply with the law of the State or Territory where the property is located or individual resides when insured. This does not interfere with any State law. There is now no State power that can reach the mails, and for this reason the insurance commissioners or actuaries of each of the several States of this Union met in Columbus, Ohio—I think in September last—and passed a resolution which I desire to have read, to show that even these distinguished gentlemen, who are vigorous, earnest, and honest, declare in so many words that because these concerns use the United States mails and have no agents within the State they can not be reached, and they suggest that this is a trouble and evil that Congress should take in hand and cure at once. I ask the Clerk to read the memorial of this convention to Congress. This resolution is forwarded to me by Mr. Folk, insurance commissioner of Tennessee, who is the author of it. There is a memorial to Congress also. Read both.

The Clerk read as follows:

The legislation proposed by this bill is in accordance with the unanimous recommendation of the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners, held at Columbus, Ohio, in September, 1902.

The following is the resolution adopted by this convention:

"Whereas it is known to the insurance departments of the various States that certain concerns styling themselves 'insurance companies,' and purporting to write fire insurance, are operating throughout the country, not only without regard to the insurance laws of the various States in which they seek patronage, but without authority of the insurance department of the States wherein their headquarters are located; and

"Whereas it is the plan of procedure of these so-called insurance companies, in order to evade State laws, to refrain from seeking any business in the State of their headquarters, and in order to evade the laws of other States to refrain from sending agents into such other States, but to use the mails of the United States to further their unlawful business, thereby avoiding liability to arrest and prosecution; and

"Whereas concerns operating in this manner as a rule are totally irresponsible, their policies being of no value; and

"Whereas the offense in the various States of operating unauthorized insurance is only a misdemeanor and therefore not extraditable, rendering the State where the unauthorized insurance is written powerless to avenge the law where the operation has been transacted through the mails: Therefore, be it

"Resolved by the convention of insurance commissioners, That the committee on unauthorized insurance is hereby directed to draft a memorial to be presented on behalf of this convention to the Postmaster-General of the United States, acquainting him with the conditions and asking him to take cognizance of these matters whereby the United States mails are being used for base and fraudulent purposes and as a means of evading the criminal statutes of the various States.

"Be it further resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to deny the use of the mails to these pseudo insurance concerns where they seek to operate through the mails in the States wherein they have not procured license to do business from the proper authorities; or, if the Postmaster-General will not go so far, that he be requested at least to prohibit the mails to any pretending insurance company which is not authorized to do business by the proper insurance authorities of the State in which it has its domicile."

MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

The following is the memorial drafted by the convention, petitioning Congress to take cognizance of the situation and grant the desired relief:

To the Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C., greeting:

The national convention of insurance commissioners, now in session at Columbus, Ohio, has the honor to address you for the purpose of respectfully and earnestly directing your attention to a serious condition of affairs which the members of this convention in their various jurisdictions are powerless to remedy, and from which substantial relief can only be obtained through enactment of amendments to the present postal laws.

We respectfully represent that to the best of our knowledge, information, and belief the United States mails are being used for fraudulent and nefarious purposes by certain concerns styling themselves "insurance companies," and seeking by correspondence and advertising matter sent through the mails to obtain money for so-called fire-insurance policies, these policies being in most instances entirely worthless. None of the concerns in question is authorized to transact business by the authority of any State in the Union. They evade the laws of the States of their domicile by writing no business therein, and evade liability to arrest and prosecution in other States by operating entirely through the medium of the mails.

We respectfully urge that Congress will take cognizance of these matters to the end that proper laws may be passed to meet the serious situation.

Respectfully,

NATIONAL INSURANCE COMMISSIONERS' CONVENTION.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to call his attention and that of the Committee of the Whole to a letter which I have received from the commissioner of insurance of my State, North Carolina, in which he calls attention to the bill recommended at the recent convention of insurance commissioners of all the States, and asks for that measure the support of myself and other members of our delegation? With the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee I ask that this letter be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I gladly yield to the gentleman's request.

The letter referred to by Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina is as follows:

INSURANCE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
Raleigh, January 26, 1903.

Hon. CHAS. R. THOMAS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I trust you will pardon my trespassing upon your time this morning, but I am very anxious to have you and the other members of our delegation to support House bill No. 16880, introduced by Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The object of this bill is to deny the use of the United States mails to insurance companies not authorized to do business in their home States. These companies are what are known as "wild-cat" or "underground" companies, and the object of the bill is to try to stamp them out.

The bill was adopted by the recent convention of the insurance commissioners of all the States.

Very truly, yours,

JAS. R. YOUNG,
Insurance Commissioner.

Mr. BROMWELL rose.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROMWELL. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee whether he has a report from the Postmaster-General to the effect that the Post-Office Department can not under existing law regulate this matter of using the United States mails to further schemes of fraudulent insurance?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman that Mr. Folk, who is the auther of this resolution, and who prepared the bill which I introduced, spent a week here a short while ago, and we conferred with the Postmaster-General and Mr. Christiancy, counsel for that Department—Mr. Folk conferred several times, I believe. They agreed that the law as it stands is not sufficient; at all events, that there was trouble about enforcing the present law, probably because not broad enough in defining fraud in law; and this bill is drawn along the lines they suggested to Mr. Folk, I dare say. I think, and my information is, this bill has been drawn so as to extend our laws to such a class of insurance business, and under the suggestions made by these officers.

Mr. BROMWELL. In view of the broad power that the Postmaster-General now exercises in regard to fraudulent matter going through the mails, I can not understand on what ground he assumes that he can not regulate and control this matter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One difficulty I can see is in regard to the definition of this "wild-cat" concern. It is undefined by law. We should define it. Things now excluded are defined or described.

In this bill we define that term as a concern that does not comply with any law—insurance law—of the State of its headquarters or domicile. There is no law with which these concerns comply. We say in this bill: "If you do not comply with the law of the State where your headquarters are, you are a wild-cat concern, and you shall not use the mails." The bill makes this definition for the Postmaster-General. The wild-cat can not escape, then, by saying: "I intended to pay when I insured him." If he never pays, and complies with the State laws named, he can use the mails unless shown to be a fraud in fact.

Mr. BROMWELL. I am not referring to the question, what is a wild-cat concern nor what a regular concern; but if fraudulent companies are using the mails for the purpose of obtaining money by false pretenses and perpetrating fraud upon the public I can not understand why the Postmaster-General has not authority now to suppress such use of the mails. He does it in the case of fraudulent patent-medicine schemes and all other fraudulent concerns of similar character. He does not come to Congress asking for additional legislation in that matter. I am sure that the use of the mails in connection with fraudulent insurance could be suppressed in the manner indicated without any additional legislation if the Postmaster-General chose to exercise his authority of withholding this fraudulent matter from the mails. Has the gentleman any written statement from the Postmaster-General?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have not; but I want to say that this bill has been submitted to Mr. Christiancy, the counsel for the Department, by Mr. Folk; and he approves the extension of the law. He said to me in substance that there would be trouble in undertaking to enforce the law as it is—that under the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States there would be trouble in enforcing the present statute. This bill is drawn to meet that opinion.

Mr. BROMWELL. Has he made any attempt; has he undertaken to withhold the name of any of these fraudulent concerns and test the question as to his authority?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am not informed. I do not think he has had any insurance case of this class—those which comply with no law. This bill extends the law so as to cover such cases. This bill makes the noncompliance with the local laws, as stated, a fraud in law, and arms the Postmaster-General with the right to bar such concerns from the use of the mails without further evidence.

I do not think such a class of cases had been presented to the Department until Mr. Folk and myself urged the Postmaster-General to bar these concerns under the present law, but in substance the Postmaster-General stated that he doubted his power to do so without "special evidence of fraud in each case"—fraud in fact. This bill bars these concerns for "noncompliance" with the State laws, as explained, such noncompliance being made a fraud in law without additional evidence showing fraud in fact.

The Postmaster-General declined to act in such cases as these without "special evidence in each case," or a change in the law, as my bill suggests. This class of cases seemed to be new to the Department, and I am satisfied none such have been tried for noncompliance with State laws as explained. Hence this bill.

Mr. BROMWELL. I think that should be done first.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I may add that General Payne, with Attorney-General Christiancy, read me a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States passing upon our postal laws which exclude fraudulent businesses from the mail, which decision, being adverse to the Government, intensified the belief of these officials that the Department is without power to exclude these lawless concerns from the mail, without evidence in each case of fraud in fact, even if they had complied with the State laws.

To prove fraud in fact in each case would greatly increase the labors of the Department, but to bar these concerns from the mail for noncompliance with the State laws would be a comparatively easy undertaking. The State officials would gladly cooperate with the Department.

Again, the proof of actual fraud is made, generally, after a fire, death, or loss has occurred and the insured refuses to pay. The insurer might not pay even after he had complied with the State laws. Still to force him to comply fully with the State laws as stated would tend to prevent fraud and encourage honest dealing before and after loss.

I am taking the time of the committee now to explain this bill, because it is very plain and patent that these fraudulent concerns exist. They produce great distress. No one will doubt these two statements. We have the postal appropriation bill under consideration, and I want to see if we can not amend it by inserting briefly the substance of my bill; and as it may be subject to a point of order, I wish to explain fully the merits and righteous purposes of the amendment, so that no one will feel warranted in raising a point of order against it.

Congress will soon adjourn; and I am afraid if we allow this opportunity to pass, the enactment of this bill into law would be deferred for a year, and maybe longer. The existence of the evil sought to be removed must be confessed. That this kind of a law will cure it is indisputable. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I take it that this is very much or identically the same proposition which the gentleman from Tennessee presented when he had the department of commerce and labor bill up for consideration.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That amendment was a very brief proposition I then offered, covered elaborately by this bill, placing the enforcement of the law in the hands of the Postmaster-General, as I remember it, under the postal power granted the Federal Government. I drew it hurriedly a few moments before I offered it and without this bill being before me. The purpose of both measures was the same.

Mr. MANN. I felt very much interested in the remarks which the gentleman made at that time on the subject, because I saw that the gentleman was endeavoring to reach in one way some gross frauds which our committee had been endeavoring to reach in another way.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And the reason why I differed with the gentleman was this: "That insurance is not commerce," says the Supreme Court of the United States; and I quoted the decisions of the Supreme Court—the Hooper case, from California—to prove that.

Mr. MANN. Well, irrespective of the question, as I stated to the gentleman at that time, I made no claim that insurance was commerce. My claim on that was that nobody knew what the Supreme Court would decide, and I still maintain that. My position in reference to a bureau of insurance was that it would be able to obtain and give out information which would lead to the correction of these abuses. Now, I understand the gentleman proposes to have the Post-Office Department investigate any insurance company to see whether it complies with local laws or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; and all insurance concerns that fail to comply with the laws of the State where their headquarters are, or where they do business, are forbidden the use of the mails by my bill.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is a very exhaustive subject for the Post-Office Department to enter into. On the same principle, we might have them investigate every corporation to see whether it complied with local laws or not. Where will you end, I ask the gentleman?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, no. This bill covers only one class of corporations. It will not be a hard job to see if they have complied with the local laws. Under the proposition which he had in his bureau of commerce and labor bill he was trying to regulate, under the interstate commerce grant of power to Congress, something—insurance—by the Federal Government which was not "commerce," and so adjudged by the courts.

Mr. MANN. That is just identically what we were not trying to do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, the gentleman is bound by the opinions of the Supreme Court, I take it. I dislike to be bound by them sometimes, I want to say to the gentleman, and sometimes I refuse. But that tribunal has thus spoken, and I thus acted, and the gentleman knows that I am sincere and honest in what I say.

Mr. MANN. I always believe the gentleman is not only sincere, but that he is bright.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thank you. With such luster around me, how could I be otherwise? [Laughter.] The gentleman was seeking to do something Congress had no power to do—regulate a business that was not "Federal business"—insurance—by just creating a little bureau to sit up here without teeth or power.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman claim that Congress does not have the power in one department of the Government to gather information, but if we transfer it to the Post-Office Department it would have the power?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly. That is what I am trying to explain to the gentleman, if he will permit me a moment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman misunderstood entirely the provision. We made no claim, in reference to gathering statistics, that we are doing it under the power to regulate commerce. We made no pretense of that in the bureau of corporations.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And having no power under the interstate "commerce" clause to regulate insurance, what right would you have to go down and order Brown and Jones in Tennessee or Illinois to open up their books in Nashville or Chicago and show they were wild-cats or angels without wings? Such a law would be unconstitutional and beyond the power of Congress to pass, but when we come to the power over the post-office and post-roads, it is as broad as the Republic. It covers the whole jurisdiction of the United States, including our colonies—and I am sorry always to use the word "colonies" in discussing any question pertaining to matters under our flag. This postal power knows no State lines.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman claim that the power the Constitution confers upon Congress must be exercised by one specific executive department of the Government, and the same power can not be exercised by another specific department of the Government in which Congress chooses to place it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I contend that Congress has the exclusive right and complete jurisdiction, regardless of State lines, to control the mails; to say what shall be mail and what shall not be; to say what can go in and what can not go in. But under the interstate-commerce clause Congress has nothing to do with insurance. You can not meddle with insurance, which is a local business—State business and not Federal business. Do you not see that that is the difference between the two bureaus? In other words, one of the bureaus—Bureau of Commerce—knows State lines, and you are obliged to submit to State lines and confine your investigations [to interstate and foreign commerce under that bureau—founded on the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

Under the postal clause, Congress has the exclusive right to "establish post-offices and post-roads," and that applies regardless of State lines, so that the Postmaster-General could send a good agent, whom, doubtless, the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. MANN] would select for him, to look after these concerns, with full power to act; and he would send him to Chicago and Nashville, and say to Smith and Jones: "Where is your State license? Have you complied with the law of Tennessee or Illinois?" And if they had not, he would have a right to exclude them from the use of the mails, because there are no State lines or State powers to prevent it.

The Federal jurisdiction is complete in such a case, just the same as where a man breaks open a letter box on the street or commits any depredation against the post-office service "within the jurisdiction of the United States." You have the right under the postal power of the Government to find out who the offender is and to punish him. You can not do that under the interstate-commerce clause.

Mr. MANN. Nobody ever claimed you could, and there was not a line in that provision relating to insurance which had anything to do with that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Under what grant of power to Congress were you seeking to create that insurance bureau?

Mr. MANN. We could create an insurance bureau under the authority that I have called attention to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And yet that was a "commerce" bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, it does not purport to be a bill relating solely to commerce. We expressly stated to the gentleman that we made no claim under that section of the bill that insurance was commerce. That is a matter that I claim is not yet decided; but we did not put it upon that ground, at all. I do not wish to take up the time of the gentleman, but the gentleman would not claim, I suppose, that the Attorney-General could not investigate these matters, in order to determine whether the Post-Office Department should exclude a concern from the use of the mails?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not at all. His power is general in Federal matters. Insurance not being Federal business, hence he could not meddle with it.

Mr. MANN. One of the very purposes of the bureau of insurance was to gather information, so that when this information was presented to Congress, showing the very broad scope of these fraudulent companies, Congress might prohibit their use of the mails.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But you were creating an insurance bureau without any legal powers to compel things to be done. I am satisfied that the gentleman agrees with me that these things should be outlawed.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And the gentleman agrees with me that we can do so this way?

Mr. MANN. I did not oppose the gentleman's amendment the other day.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman will agree with me that we can invoke the Post-Office Department to assist in uprooting these lawless concerns. We can do that under that grant of power.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that we can.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now I hope the gentleman will try to get this committee to do this. The gentleman may go now and write this amendment, if he chooses. Heaven knows I do not care anything about authorship. What I want to do is to help the people, and to outlaw these concerns.

I see there is some new law proposed in this appropriation bill, and I want a little amendment that will get down to the root of this evil, so that the people will be protected as much as possible.

The gentleman knows that the State authorities now are as powerful as they can be in such matters, but this post-office power is not within the jurisdiction of the State authorities, and, therefore, this great convention comes up and states that fact and says: "Now, we ask the Government to get out of partnership with these frauds, to stop them from using the mails," and the Postmaster-General, in substance, does not feel that he has the power now to do it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I can conceive a very great difference between having a bureau of the Government which publishes the information that it receives, so that everybody receives fair treatment, and some unknown official in the Post-Office Department, who publishes no information, who makes no report to the public, who does not print the information that he receives, but who passes upon the question who shall use the mails and who shall not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The difference between the gentleman and myself in this matter, I am glad to see, is not in purpose. We both want to outlaw this fraudulent business, but he would invoke the commerce power of the Federal Government—which does not cover the insurance business—while I desire to invoke the postal power that can cover that business legally and powerfully, and the statutes enacted thereunder I desire to extend to the insurance business.

Mr. Chairman, to show you that the Postmaster-General feels that he can not exclude these concerns for noncompliance with State laws I cite the committee to the fact that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] a few days ago, in this Chamber, denounced these concerns as "catamounts," holding aloft, as he stated, "the names of thirty-two in number." I wish he had published the list. They are playing havoc all over the country. Now, if the Postmaster-General was not convinced that he did not have the power, under the present law, he would have excluded these concerns before this from the mails.

Mr. Folk and myself discussed thoroughly with General Payne and Attorney-General Christiancy the necessity for immediate action barring these concerns from the mails, but without effect, save and except they suggested this amendment to the existing law with an appropriation to execute it.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court I referred to a few moments ago intensified their desire for this amendment which they approved. I submit, however, that it should be further elaborated by requiring the insuring party or thing to comply with the laws of the State or Territory wherein the party insured lives or the property insured is situated, so that suits, if necessary, can be immediately brought and into local courts. This would protect the people at both ends of the line.

This bill has been referred to a subcommittee, but the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], is absent. Learning this, I went to the other two gentlemen who are on that committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD]. They are both ready to proceed with the consideration of this bill as soon as the chairman returns, which may be some time yet.

But here, now, we have up this Post-Office appropriation bill. We can put a little amendment on here to cover these cases, and nobody ought to object or interpose a point of order.

What is the object of a point of order?

It is to prevent the members from being taken by surprise and provoke full consideration. Nobody could be taken by surprise in this matter after what has been said about these concerns and this bill.

Here is a great appropriation bill carrying out the laws referring to the mails. The Postmaster-General does not think he has power enough, and here is the gentleman from Ohio ready and willing to consider the matter, and so is the gentleman from Missouri; and if this amendment is offered and no point of order made, this law can be made this session, plain and powerful, and the Postmaster-General can soon act.

Mr. BROMWELL. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I will state that the gentleman is entirely correct in stating that "the gentleman from Ohio" is as much opposed to this wild-cat insurance as the gentleman from Tennessee. The first case I ever had the pleasure of carrying from the police court of Cincinnati to the supreme court of Ohio was a wild-cat insurance case. I won the case all along the line, and the violator of the law was severely punished as a result.

My sympathies are entirely with the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee; but this is a matter that has come into the Post-Office Committee's hand by a bill offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, which is now in the hands of the subcommittee, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is chairman; and I think I can assure the gentleman that as soon as General BINGHAM returns and is able to call that subcommittee together the bill will receive consideration, and I have no doubt, so far as the subcommittee, and possibly the full committee, are concerned, that it will receive a favorable report.

At the present I would much prefer not to attempt to put it on an appropriation bill. There is some information that the subcommittee itself thinks it would like to get from the Postmaster-General before they unqualifiedly approve this bill. I myself would like to have a statement of the Postmaster-General officially saying that he has not adequate power for him now to enforce the law against these frauds, and I would further like to have an indorsement of the Postmaster-General in writing as to his approval of this particular bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am perfectly willing to have all that, but I do not want this Congress to die without the enactment of this or a similar measure.

Mr. BROMWELL. There is over a month yet before Congress expires.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But, inasmuch as the chairman is absent and has been absent for some time, I do not know how long he may be, and the gentleman says "if" he comes back he will do so and so; but will he give consideration to this bill in time for Congress to act?

I am ready now to go with the gentleman from Ohio or the gentleman from Missouri to the Postmaster-General and have a conference with him regarding this matter. I am ready to do anything proper rather than to let this bill hang on for another twelve months when we know we can give relief here by a small amendment which will give the necessary power to the Postmaster-General.

However, I will abide by the gentleman's suggestion and not offer the amendment, hoping to pass the bill this session.

Mr. Chairman, I want to submit a letter from the actuary of the insurance department of the great State of Missouri. When we had this matter up a few days ago one of my distinguished colleagues from that State [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] objected to the position I took about this matter, and said the State laws were sufficient and that the bill was pure "Federalism." I am invoking Federal power in this bill. It can not be a State power unless you amend the Constitution and give the postal power back to the States. Will the Clerk please read the letter?

The Clerk read as follows:

INSURANCE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF MISSOURI,
City of Jefferson, January 27, 1903.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I take this opportunity of expressing my approval of House bill No. 16880, introduced by you on the 19th of January, 1903, providing that certain sections of the statutes of the United States shall be made applicable to insurance companies or organizations not authorized by the State or Territory in which they are organized or domiciled. This is a measure which should receive the support of every member of Congress, as it will materially assist in stamping out a fraud which is practiced, I believe, in every Congressional district in the United States, and one which has become very annoying to the people. I trust the measure will become a law. I have also written a member of Congress from the district in which I live, namely, Hon. W. D. VANDIVER, of the Fourteenth district of Missouri.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. B. REYNOLDS, Actuary.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to insert in the RECORD, with the consent of the committee, in extending my remarks on this question, a list of the fraudulent concerns that have been excluded from the use of the mails under the present law, so as to show the committee what has been excluded—and I take it that everything has been excluded that could have been under the law—and I fail to find any insurance company in the list. If I am correct, there is an active official construction of the law as it is, showing an absence of power.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to insert with his remarks a list. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The paper referred to is as follows:

FRAUDULENT MATTER IN THE MAILS—INSTRUCTIONS TO POSTMASTERS.

31. It having been made to appear to the Postmaster-General, upon evidence satisfactory to him, that the Honduras National Lottery Co., Paul Conrad, President, and Paul Conrad, at Puerto Cortez, Honduras, Central America; Juarez Beneficiencia Publica Lottery, and M. Now, therefore, by authority vested in him by said act, and by the act of Congress entitled "An act for the suppression of lottery traffic through international and interstate commerce and the postal service, subject to the jurisdiction and laws of the United States," approved March 2, 1895, the Postmaster-General hereby forbids you to pay any postal money order drawn to the order of said parties, and you are hereby directed to inform the remitter of any such postal money order that payment thereof has been forbidden, and that the amount thereof will be returned upon the presentation of a duplicate money order applied for and obtained under the regulations of the Department.

And you are hereby instructed to return all letters, whether registered or not, and other mail matter which shall arrive at your office directed to the said parties to the postmasters at the offices at which they were originally mailed, to be delivered to the senders thereof with the word "Fraudulent" plainly written or stamped upon the outside of such letters or matter: Provided, however, That where there is nothing to indicate who are the senders of letters not registered or other matter, you are directed in that case to send such letters and matter to the Dead Letter Office with the word "Fraudulent" plainly written or stamped thereon, to be disposed of as other dead matter under the laws and regulations applicable thereto.

32. The attention of postmasters and other employees of the postal service is called to section 499, P. L. and R., which prohibits the circulation in the mails of all matter relating to lotteries, or schemes offering prizes dependent upon lot or chance. In cases of doubt, where postmasters have reason to believe that any scheme or advertisement is in violation of the lottery law, they should refer the matter to the Department for instructions.

33. Postmasters must not give opinions as to the construction of the lottery law as applicable to advertisements or schemes submitted to them. All such questions should be referred to the Department.

FOREIGN LOTTERY MATTER.

34. Postmasters and other postal officials are hereby notified that "fraud orders" issued against lottery companies and their officers operating in foreign countries do not cover mail matter originating in foreign countries and simply passing through our territory, but cover mail matter originating in this country only which is addressed to any of the parties named in such orders.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I desire now to discuss the power of Congress to exclude persons and concerns engaged in "wild-cat insurance business" and "trusts" which restrain trade from the use of the mails.

Congress, and not the States, has exclusive control of our postal service. Congress has admitted and excluded what Congress chose to admit or exclude, and this power was by Congress invoked in crushing lotteries, and in the noted case of In re Rapier, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, for the Supreme Court of the United States, upheld the act of Congress—the antilottery statute. There can be no doubt of its constitutionality, nor of the bill I have introduced extending the provisions of this antilottery statute to wild-cat insurance concerns.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Pensacola Telegraph Company against the Western Union Telegraph Company (96 U. S., pp. 8, 9), said:

> Congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and amongst the several States (Const., Art. 1, Sec. 8, 3), and to establish post-offices and post-roads (Id., paragraph 7). Since the case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1), it has never been doubted that commercial intercourse is an element of commerce which comes within the regulating power of Congress.
> Post-offices and post-roads are established to facilitate the transmission of intelligence. Both commerce and the postal service are placed within the power of Congress because, being national in their operation, they should be under the protecting care of the National Government.

I stop here to call special attention to this language of the court:

> Post-offices and post-roads are established to facilitate the transmission of intelligence.

I know of no decision of the Supreme Court of the United States defining a letter to be "commerce." It would seem that a letter is "intelligence" carried in the mail, or out of the mail I may add.

IS MAIL "COMMERCE" OR IS THE POSTAL SERVICE A FACILITY OR INSTRUMENT OF "COMMERCE IN LAW?"

The "commerce" grant of power and the "postal" grant of power to Congress are separate and distinct grants, the first being given to regulate "commerce" among the several States and foreign nations, and the other—the postal grant—to regulate the transmission of "intelligence" by and through the postal service.

This is evidently the distinction drawn by the court in this case, for the court says:

> The powers (postal and commerce) thus granted are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce, or the postal service known or in use when the Constitution was adopted * * * They were intended for the government of the business to which they relate at all times and under all circumstances.

The court states how these two—"both"—powers were "intended" to be used—their purpose—for the court in the next sentence says:

> As they (these two powers) were intrusted to the General Government for the good of the nation, it is not only the right but the duty of Congress to see to it that (1) intercourse among the States and (2) the transmission of intelligence are not obstructed or unnecessarily encumbered by State legislation.

IS A LETTER COMMERCE?

It is plain to me that the "commerce" power of Congress was intended and is to be used to regulate what is known as "commerce" and the "postal" power, a separate and distinct grant, is "intended" to be used in the "transmission of intelligence" by way of letters. Or to put it differently, "commerce" is one thing and "intelligence" is another. Commerce is one thing and mail another.

Of course Congress can and does permit certain small commodities to be sent through the mails, but such articles are "commerce," not "intelligence," not information, not letters.

THE LITTLEFIELD TRUST BILL—DOES IT EXCLUDE TRUSTS FROM THE MAILS?

I have referred to this opinion for the purpose of reminding Congress that the antitrust bill reported to the House a few days ago by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] omits to use plain language for excluding from the mails (assuming for the present this is the intention of the bill, which I doubt) trusts, combines, monopolies, etc.. engaged in the restraint of "interstate" trade. Here is the language of this bill, which provides that these "trusts," etc., in restraint of interstate trade (not State trade) "shall not use the facilities or instrumentalities of interstate commerce."

If this language is "intended" to cover the "postal service" as one of the "facilities or instrumentalities of interstate commerce," I have grave doubts that it succeeds, under the opinion of the Supreme Court just quoted.

Even conceding that it does, or that its author honestly intended this language to cover the postal service and exclude interstate trusts, etc., described in the bill, from the use of the mails, I submit that it is better that we say literally what we mean than use doubtful terms. We can easily do that. We can say the "trust," etc. (described in the bill), "shall not use the mails."

This removes all doubt of the intention of Congress. These words are plain. They are well understood. Why not use plain language? The courts have defined them and Congress has used them heretofore, for similar words are now included in certain of our postal laws.

The courts would not be called on to define these words or explain their meaning.

If the language, "facilities or instrumentalites of interstate commerce" is used, delay follows, litigation ensues; and the courts, already crowded, it is said, must "construe" this language and judicially hold that the postal system is one of our interstate "facilities or instrumentalities," in the face of the fact already shown in the telegraph case referred to, wherein the court said:

Post-offices and post-roads are established to facilitate the transmission of intelligence.

The court in this case treats the "commerce" power and the "postal power" of Congress as separate and distinct powers, the one granted to control interstate and foreign commerce, and the other to control "the transmission of intelligence" by the use of post-offices and post-roads.

WHAT DEMOCRATS AND REPUBLICANS DID IN FIFTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

In the Fifty-sixth Congress, January 3, 1900, I introduced a bill to regulate trusts. That bill described fully trusts, monopolies, combines, etc., it proposed to regulate. It covered all concerns, including persons who undertook to restrain both State or interstate trade.

This Littlefield bill is confined to interstate trade only.

I discussed my bill thoroughly two or three times in the House. Both Democrats and Republicans thought so well of this plan as one of the ways to regulate trusts—both Democrats and Republicans adopted it. They incorporated this provision in an antitrust bill which passed the House and went to the Senate, where, and as the Democrats prophesied, it received an untimely death and prompt burial by the willing hands of Republican Senatorial pallbearers, ever faithful to their allies—trusts. [Laughter.]

I now ask, if the Republicans mean to exclude trusts from the mails, why abandon the plain language thus adopted by both parties in the last Congress, that these trusts, etc., "shall not use the mails," and adopt the novel, undefined, unused, indefinite, and at least doubtful language of "facilities or instrumentalities of interstate commerce" in lieu.

It is strange that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], who said much in the last campaign in favor of outlawing trusts, now voluntarily, or under the directions of the President, who said last fall that he (the President) must be taken as being sincerely opposed to trusts—that his "my words must be taken at their face value"—should now use language undefined by the courts and of doubtful meaning if the gentleman from Maine and the President, or either, really mean to say by that language "that the trusts shall not use the mails."

WHY NOT EXCLUDE STATE TRUST TRADE FROM THE MAILS?

Assuming that the words "facilities or instrumentalities of interstate commerce" are broad enough on their face for the court to twist or construe them into meaning or covering our "postal service" and that the trusts, etc., described in the bill could not lawfully use the mails, still trusts, combines, monopolies, etc., engaged exclusively in the restraint of "State" trade are not excluded from the mails by this bill, because it applies to "interstate" trust trade and not to State trust trade, that is, trades in restraint of commerce done wholly within the limits of the State.

Whereas if all trusts, etc., in restraint of State and interstate trade were excluded from the use of the mails, the source and the stream of "commerce," State and interstate, would be stripped of State trusts restraining State trade and State trusts or interstate "trusts" restraining interstate or foreign trade.

Why invoke half the power of Congress over our post-roads and mail? Why exclude only trusts engaged in restraint of interstate trade from the mails? Why make half a bite at a whole cherry? The trade, whether State or interstate, begins within the limits of some one of the several States or Territories. There the trust's seed is planted. There it grows. There it spreads like a great banyan tree. There State trust trade begins, and from that trade flows interstate and foreign trade.

Why not, then, broaden this bill so as to exclude all trusts, etc., from the use of the mails when engaged in State trust trade or interstate and foreign trust trade, or all three of them?

The bill which I introduced January 3, 1900, in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and again in the present Congress, December 6, 1902, clearly covers this unfortunate omission in the Littlefield bill now before this Congress, excluding both State and interstate trust trade from the mails.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman [Mr. PALMER] who now honors me by listening attentively to my remarks asked yesterday my colleague [Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee] this question: "Can Congress prohibit interstate commerce?"

I will answer the gentleman with pleasure, and say, Yes, and Congress has done so, and the Supreme Court of the United States, from the days of Chief Justice John Marshall down to the days of Chief Justice Fuller, have held that the power to "regulate interstate and foreign commerce given to Congress is full and complete in Congress," and that Congress, under this power, can "prohibit" trusts, combines, etc., which "directly restrict interstate and foreign commerce."

Mr. Justice Peckham, for the whole court, in the noted Addyston pipe-trust case, uses the word "prohibit" in defining the extent of this power as to interstate trusts, and that word has been frequently employed in defining the extent of the power of Congress to regulate this outlawed "commerce."

The court in this pipe-trust case affirmed the circuit court of appeals in this construction of this power (with a slight alteration of the decree which undertook to enjoin that portion of this pipe-trust business done wholly within the State of Tennessee, the headquarters of this concern).

The court confined, in other words, the operation of the antitrust act of June 2, 1890, to the prohibition of all contracts and combinations in direct restraint of interstate and foreign commerce, and distinctly held that this act provides that such concerns are "prohibited" and can be and were prohibited legally by Congress under this act.

The opinion of the circuit court of appeals was rendered by the full court—Justices Taft, of Ohio; Lurton, of Tennessee, and Severens, of Michigan—Mr. Justice Taft speaking for the court.

In reading these two opinions and the cases they cite, you will immediately see that Congress has the power under this commerce law to regulate, even to the extent of prohibiting, both interstate and foreign commerce, and hence we are forced to the conclusion that Congress can "prohibit" both.

Indeed, Congress has prohibited both, and begun at an early date; so did the several States before the Constitution.

I cited a number of such Congressional statutes in my speech in the House June 2, 1900, and reviewed all the authorities, or many of them, on the subject, two of which I have already cited, and I would feel honored if the distinguished gentleman [Mr. PALMER] would scan that speech, easily found here in the House library (RECORD, vol. 33, appendix, 1st sess. 56th Cong., p. 688). I will insert this particular portion of this speech in extending my remarks, as follows:

1. The Wilson tariff law of 1894 prohibited the importation of convict-made goods in these words:

"That all goods, wares, articles, merchandise, manufactured wholly or in part in any foreign country by convict labor shall not be entitled to entry at any of the ports of the United States, and the importation thereof is hereby prohibited," etc.

This prohibitory provision was carried into and is now a part of the Dingley tariff law. So, in recent legislation both the advocates of the Wilson tariff law—the Democrats—as well as of the Dingley tariff law—the Republicans—under its commerce power has the right to prohibit foreign commerce, and, as I will show later on, interstate commerce, too.

2. The old laws prohibiting commerce with France and England, known as the embargo acts, were held constitutional as a proper exercise of the commerce power of Congress. They were generally approved and discussed in the Clark v. Field case (143 U. S.), where the McKinley tariff law was brought into question. Mr. Cooley, on the Principles of the Constitution, citing cases at page 70, says the embargo acts were a "constitutional" exercise of our commerce powers, and adds:

"The power that controls commerce from the very nature of things includes the power to restrict and limit—to prohibit as to certain things and to suspend altogether when, for the time, it seems wise. It is a sovereign power and knows no limit."

Again:

"The power to regulate commerce among the several States is granted to Congress in terms as absolute as is the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations." (Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S., 622; Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S., 47.)

3. Congress has prohibited commerce with the Indian tribes even within the limits of a State and all manner of trade with them except by persons duly commissioned (act August 15, 1876), and has empowered the President to prohibit the introduction of certain articles of commerce into Indian Territory (United States Revised Statutes, 2132). Congress has prohibited the exportation of cattle from Indian Territory for trade (United States Revised Statutes, 2133) and the sale of liquors to Indians (Ib., 2139).

These laws have all been held constitutional, and the power is unquestionable.

Chief Justice Taney, in the celebrated License cases (5 Howard, 504), enunciates the same doctrine:

"Congress under its general power to regulate commerce with foreign nations may prescribe what articles of merchandise shall be admitted and what excluded, and may, therefore, admit or not, as it shall seem best, the importation of ardent spirits."

And in the United States v. Forty-three Gallons of Whisky, etc. (93 United States, 188), it was likewise held that—

"Congress under its constitutional power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes may not only prohibit the unlicensed introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in the Indian country, but extend such prohibition to territory in proximity to that occupied by the Indians."

In United States v. Holiday (3 Wallace, 407) it was held that—

"The circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction of the selling of ardent spirits to an Indian under the act of February 12, 1862.

"By that act Congress made it penal to sell spirituous liquors to an Indian under the charge of an Indian agent, although it was sold outside of any Indian reservation and within the limits of a State. The act is constitutional under the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes."

We have seen from the cases above cited, based, as all our commerce law in question is, on the leading case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheaton), that the power to regulate interstate commerce is as complete as the power to regulate international commerce, and we see that Congress has the power, and has exercised it constitutionally, to actually prohibit international commerce.

Then why should Congress hesitate to prohibit interstate trust commerce? It clearly has the power and undertook to exercise it in the antitrust act of 1890.

In the recent Pipe case (175 U. S.) Justice Peckham, for the whole court, says:

"The reasons which may have caused the framers of the Constitution to repose the power to regulate interstate commerce in Congress do not, however, affect or limit the extent of the power itself.

"In Gibbons v. Ogden (supra) the power was declared to be complete in itself and to acknowledge no limitations other than are prescribed by the Constitution.

"Under this grant of power to Congress, that body, in our judgment, may enact such legislation as may declare void and prohibit the performance of any contracts between individuals or corporations where the natural and direct effect of such a contract will be, when carried out, to directly, and not as a mere incident to other and innocent purposes, regulate to any substantial extent interstate commerce. (And when we speak of interstate we also include in our meaning foreign commerce.) We do not assent to the correctness of the proposition that the constitutional guaranty of liberty to the individual to enter into private contracts limits the power of Congress and prevents it from legislating upon the subjects of contracts of the class mentioned.

"The power to regulate interstate commerce is, as stated by Chief Justice Marshall, full and complete in Congress, and there is no limitation in the grant of the power which excludes private contracts of the nature in question from the jurisdiction of that body. Nor is any such limitation contained in that other clause of the Constitution which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

"The provision in the Constitution does not, as we believe, exclude Congress from legislating with regard to contracts of the above nature while in the exercise of its constitutional rights to regulate commerce among the States. On the contrary, we think the provision regarding the liberty of the citizen is, to some extent, limited by the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce comprises the right to enact the law prohibiting the citizen from entering into those private contracts which directly and substantially, and not merely indirectly, remotely, incidentally, and collaterally regulate to a greater or less degree commerce among the States.

"We can not so enlarge the scope of the language of the Constitution regarding the liberty of the citizen as to hold that it includes or that it was intended to include a right to make a contract which in fact restrained and regulated interstate commerce, notwithstanding Congress, proceeding under the constitutional provision giving to it the power to regulate that commerce had prohibited such contracts."

We then see here, from the latest utterance, that Congress did "prohibit" interstate-commerce trust combines, and that such a provision does not trench upon that liberty of the citizen the Constitution guarantees. In the other two leading cases, The United States v. Joint Traffic Association (171 U. S., 505) and the Missouri transportation case (136 U. S.), the court holds that Congress has the power to prohibit interstate trust commerce which is interstate commerce.

4. Congress has prohibited the importation of adulterated or unwholesome food or drugs and other things injurious to health (acts August 30, 1890, March 2, 1897) and the importation and exportation of diseased cattle (act August 30, 1890), and interstate commerce in diseased live stock (act May 29, 1884), and the exportation of slaughtered meat (act March 3, 1891).

5. Congress has prohibited the immigration of idiots, insane persons, criminals, polygamists, and Chinese (acts March 3, 1891, March 3, 1894, August 3, 1882, March 3, 1875). See the authorities touching upon these various acts and the power of Congress to enforce them in Desty's Federal Constitution, and Prentiss and Egan on the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, page 337, etc.

6. Only a few days ago Congress passed what is known as the Lacey bird bill, prohibiting the sale and transmission of birds killed in a State prohibiting their killing to another State, which, as the author of the bill, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], admitted in his speech was based upon the right of Congress to prohibit interstate commerce.

7. Congress a few days ago passed a bill allowing the States to prohibit the introduction of convict-made goods in the several States that may refuse their admission.

8. In 1888, May 22 (RECORD, vol. 92, p. 4533), the House, by vote of 185 to 44, passed a bill prohibiting convict-made goods from being shipped from one State to another. Our most notable Republicans and Democrats in that Congress supported that measure—Mr. Speaker HENDERSON, President McKinley, Representatives GROW, Grout, HOPKINS, CANNON, DALZELL, Brown of Ohio, Dingley, Senator BURROWS, Senator Gear, Senator LODGE, Senator MASON, and many leading Democrats.

Now, in the face of the action of Congress here shown for over a hundred years in prohibiting—not simply regulating, but prohibiting—international and interstate commerce, can any fair-minded man, halfway patriotic, longer dispute that Congress has the power to prohibit interstate and international commerce? For a hundred years Congress has enacted such legislation, and the court has uniformly upheld such laws.

Why, then, should Congress not prohibit interstate trust commerce?

At an early day we passed embargo acts, by which we prohibited foreign commerce and held up commercial ship lines. They were held valid laws under the commerce grant of Congress to "regulate" commerce. Mr. Cooley cites some of the courts who upheld these laws, although the opponents of the laws claimed the power to "regulate" did not include or extend to the "annihilation" of commerce. But in a case from Massachusetts, decided in 1808 or 1809, the Federal court declared the power went that far, but the embargo act did not annihilate "all commerce." Annihilation was unnecessary even as a war measure.

ANNIHILATION IS A QUESTION OF POLICY AND NOT POWER.

In the construction of the McKinley tariff law, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S. Rept.), referred to these embargo and other prohibitory acts approvingly, going to show what Congress had done and could do legally under this power to regulate commerce.

We prohibited the importation of convict-made goods under the Wilson tariff law.

We prohibited the transportation of diseased cattle through the States.

We prohibited the importation of diseased goods.

We prohibited the importation of certain undesirable foreigners.

We prohibited the transmission of liquors to the Indians.

We prohibited the use of interstate freight trains without certain car couplers—to preserve life.

We recently prohibited the shipment of game from States prohibiting its killing and shipment—the Lacey law.

All of these acts, or many of them, I referred to briefly in my speech of June 2, 1900.

There can be no question about the "extent" of the power of Congress to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, and if we stand by the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States we can go so far as to "prohibit" such commerce. Whether we should prohibit honest commerce is a question of policy and not of power under these decisions.

But we see the court of last resort has already decided, time and again, that Congress can "prohibit" and that Congress has legally "prohibited objectionable" interstate and foreign commerce, and that is the question. That is the issue, plus the enforcement of the law as it is and as amended. This is as far as we need to go to remedy this evil.

"TRUSTS" ARE OUTLAWS.

I denounce, along with this court and the great mass of the people of the United States, all trusts, monopolies, corporations, or other concerns which, or persons who directly restrain State, interstate, or foreign commerce.

Such business is outlawed by the wish and for the welfare of the people and for the preservation of the purposes of the Government, which purposes are to encourage and protect each and every individual within the jurisdiction of this Republic in his inalienable right of preserving his life, maintaining his happiness, his liberty, and protecting the high and the low from lawlessly harming each other.

Monopolies are outlawed by the common law, which has been defined as "the collected wisdom of ages."

Mr. Justice Jackson, of Tennessee, soon after the enactment of the antitrust act of 1890, declared that law to be the common law broadened in some parts, and I believe Judge Taft thus spoke in delivering the opinion in the Pipe case.

Monopolies are outlawed by the common law and the statute law of nearly all if not quite all of the States and organized Territories of the United States, including even Alaska.

They have no right to exist, in law or morals. They are contrary to both. They cheat, in whole or a part, God's creatures out of their own personal chance to live and make a living in the easiest moral and legal way they can.

I believe in self-ownership and its preservation, personal independence, and rectitude of purpose, respecting always conscientiously and from a moral standpoint the smallest right that is the right of another.

The trouble about monopolies is they protect their own rights, if they have any, and absorb, grab, or destroy the rights of others, which is contrary to good morals, and hence contrary to the common law and our antitrust statutes and a healthy public policy.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. If it were necessary, in order to destroy the trusts, to destroy all commerce, would you do it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That question is one in the extreme. That is unnecessary. It in effect assumes or states that "trusts" are "all commerce," which I deny. "Trusts" are not legal or moral "commerce." "Commerce" is moral business and not immoral business. "Commerce" is legal business and not illegal business. Trusts in restraint of commerce are immoral, illegal, and contrary to the common law of the land, the State laws, and the Federal laws on trusts, to the spirit of our institutions, are in derogation to the rights of the people, contrary to the purposes of the Government, and therefore fly in the face of a healthy public policy and hence should be and are therefore outlawed, always have been, and such "commerce," if you denominate "trusts" "commerce," should be absolutely destroyed.

And it is begging the question for the gentleman to assume that we must destroy "all" commerce to strip honest commerce, if you please, of immoral and illegal commerce—trusts—assuming for argument that trusts are "commerce."

Limbs are often amputated to save the body, but because a patient now and then dies as a result of such act it is no use to stop cutting limbs off.

Again, the gentleman assumes that all commerce is represented by the trusts or trusts are all commerce.

This is a confession (1) that there are trusts, and (2) which "Congress" can "destroy"—a concession that trusts exist, and a further concession that trusts are in a majority, and, although an evil because in the majority trusts must survive and honest commerce remain oppressed, the people starved, and money getting and money holding put above the man who makes honest commerce.

It may be true that there are more sinners than saints in a given community; that the devil is in the majority; and if so, I take the stand with the minority and insist on whipping him out. We have done so on many occasions and protected society.

I agree with my friend that there are many trusts and that they may control "all commerce," and I am reminded by the question he has asked me of a stanza which as a schoolboy I was required to parse:

Wherever God's people erect a house of prayer,
The devil always builds a chapel there;
And 'twill be found, upon examination,
The latter has the largest congregation.

God's people and the Democrats, gentlemen, I dare say, built "the house of prayer." The Republicans and the trust the "chapel."

And from the manner in which the Republicans are administering the antitrust laws of this country, the way in which your Attorney-General is executing them, or rather not executing them, and the way in which the President is allowing him to execute them, or rather not execute them, there is a larger congregation of trusts—the offspring of Republicanism—in this country controlling the welfare of this people, stifling honest trade, honest commerce, and honest people than ever existed before in the history of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

ANTITRUST ACT OF JUNE 21, 1890, DRASTIC.

And it is not because the law is not drastic and powerful. It is entirely inoffensive unless the Attorney-General first acts, and executes, and makes it offensive. It became law without a dissenting vote in the House or Senate. Not a single vote against it on its passage. Both parties supported it.

BOTH PARTIES DOUBTED ITS CONSTITUTIONALITY IN 1890.

Both parties doubted its constitutionality then, but said, "We will leave that to the court," notably Mr. Kerr, of Iowa, a Republican.

The court of last resort in powerful opinions has held it entirely constitutional and paid tribute to the lawmakers who framed it. And I want to say to my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], whose friendship and society I always enjoy, that wherever this act of 1890 has been applied to an "interstate" trust combine that combine has been crushed out of existence.

FIRST CASE UNDER ACT JUNE 2, 1890.

The first case arose in Tennessee between a coal association of Nashville and a coal company of Kentucky, known as the Jellico coal case, reprinted in 46th Tennessee Reports. A preliminary injunction was refused by Judge Hammond, a Republican, inasmuch as the statute, as he said, was new and the Government was not required under it to give bond! So, to that extent, that a "temporary" injunction was refused is true, as stated by Attorney-General Knox in one of his recent publications; but the distinguished Attorney-General should have gone further and said on final hearing, had in three or four months after the bill was filed, a "permanent injunction" was granted and this coal trust crushed; or, to use the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, this coal trust was "destroyed." Yet the honest coal business survived and is thriving in Kentucky and Tennessee, and coal is selling there to-day at $3.50 to $3.75 a ton—and why? The laws are enforced. Our antitrust statutes are enforced. The people are on top.

Let me add just here that the permanent injunction was granted in this Jellico case after due deliberation, but promptly, by the late lamented Judge David M. Key, an old Confederate soldier, and that the distinguished and able United States district attorney who had charge of the case at Nashville was the Hon. John Rhum, an old Federal soldier, who fought another kind of a battle in and about Nashville over forty years ago.

Here the old Confederate and Federal soldier met and, as usual, drew blood—not from the people, but from the trusts.

Mr. Chairman, if the present laws were enforced relief would follow, I believe, the act of June 2, 1890, and an antitrust act incorporated in the Wilson tariff law and continued by the present Dingley tariff law being our two antitrust acts.

Not a single suit has been filed under the latter law of which I have ever heard, and I have industriously investigated the books and records to see. Not a case can I find. Why is this? Have we not ship trusts, international tobacco trusts, and other trusts nominated in the public press and undisputed? Why this nonaction?

PUBLICITY SHORT OF THE EVIL TO BE CURED.

I agree to your publicity proposition, but I want more. Publicity falls short of the mark; but, oh heavens and earth! How much more "publicity" do you want than the "publicity" we have had to show, for instance, the outrageous lawlessness practiced in Pennsylvania to-day, and that, too, in defiance of laws of that State, which prohibit the combination of coal companies and railroads that have produced the awful conditions of that old State?

Why, sir, the Interstate Commerce Commission, in its last report, "advance sheets," page 53, say that "The Lehigh Valley Coal Company is a corporation owned by the Lehigh Railroad Company," and I may add and charge this railroad owns and operates this coal company in the face of the constitution of Pennsylvania, which says that "railroads shall not own or operate, directly or indirectly, coal mines in" that State.

The Interstate Commerce Commission incorporates in its report the opinion of Judge McPherson, of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern division of Pennsylvania, delivered more than a year ago, January 4, 1902, and is reported in 112 Federal Reporter, 487, in the case of Lehigh Valley Railroad Company against Rainey and others.

Rainey sued this "railroad" in the State court for discriminating, in hauling coal, in favor of the Lehigh Valley Coal Company, but it was transferred to the State court.

The Federal court dismissed the suit, the court finding that there was only a "paper of theoretical discrimination," no actual discrimination or damage done Rainey, because the railroad had not hauled any coal "except for its own engines" between the points wherein Rainey alleged discrimination.

But in the course of the opinion the court, in alluding to the coal actually hauled between the two points for the use of the railroad's own engines, said:

This coal was mined by the Lehigh Valley Coal Company, which was clearly proved to be the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company. The identity of interest between the two corporations was so plain that it seemed idle to question it, so far as its practical effect upon the matter at issue was concerned, although, of course, the court did not intend to treat as nonexistent for all purposes the legal distinction between the two separate corporate entities. But dealing with real things and not with mere shows, it was clear to my mind that (for the purposes of the case before me) the coal company was mining as the scarcely veiled hand of the railroad company, and therefore that it made no difference at all what rate of freight was formally charged by the railroad company for hauling the coal. In essence, the railroad company mined, carried, and burned its own coal; and, under such circumstances, I still think it was correct to say that a charge for freight would be little more than a bookkeeping entry.

In other words, this railroad (1) owns its own coal mines, (2) digs its own coal for its own use and the public, (3) loads its own coal on its own cars, (4) hauls it at its own real or "paper" fixed rate of transportation, (5) hauls this coal on its own road into Eastern and Atlantic States, fixes its own selling price, an item being probably its "paper" rate for hauling, and (6) sells this coal to a freezing people at from $10 to $14 and $20, through some agent skulking around the streets of New York and Boston robbing an unoffending people.

Mr. Chairman, I will read the constitution of Pennsylvania, which prohibits railroads from owning or operating coal mines, directly or indirectly; yet you see they are now doing so.

This constitution reads thus:

202. No incorporated company, doing the business of a common carrier, shall, directly or indirectly, prosecute or engage in mining or manufacturing articles for transportation over its works; nor shall such company, directly or indirectly, engage in any other business than that of common carriers, or hold or acquire lands, freehold or leasehold, directly or indirectly, except such as shall be necessary for carrying on its business; but any mining or manufacturing company may carry the products of its mines and manufactories on its railroad or canal, not exceeding 50 miles in length.

203. No president, director, officer, agent, or employee of any railroad or canal company shall be interested, directly or indirectly, in the furnishing of material or supplies to such company, or in the business of transportation as a common carrier of frieght or passengers over the works owned, leased, controlled, or worked by such company.

I dare say that this provision of this constitution was suggested by the noted opinion in the Morris Coal Company case by Judge Agnew of the Pennsylvania supreme court, where that great jurist under the common law broke up a combination of six coal companies in that State in 1871 or 1872—somewhere about that time. But the courts are silent in Pennsylvania now, on trusts and monopolies, as the tomb.

Now, gentlemen, here is "publicity" of both fact and law; but chaos, trusts, and insurrection abide and abound in Pennsylvania. Here are the facts found by the Federal court over a year ago, that this railroad company owned and operated these coal mines, and here is the constitution which says they shall not do either. And yet it is being done in defiance of all law and order.

This railroad is an "interstate instrumentality," and is hauling, beyond question, its coal through and out of Pennsylvania into States along the Atlantic coast in open defiance of the antitrust act of June 2, 1890, which clearly applies here, because it is an undisputed fact that this railroad is in a combination with four or five other railroads, and that they all own coal mines in Pennsylvania, operate them, haul the coal therefrom, fix their own rates of transportation, and sell this coal in other States by and through their agents, and at a rate that is arbitrary and prohibitory, so high is the price.

Yet neither the laws of Pennsylvania nor of the United States are being enforced against this unholy combination. The governor and State officials of Pennsylvania know of these lawless acts, yet they act not to prevent or destroy them or these combinations, but rather encourage them.

No one can tell me that Mr. Knox, the Attorney-General of the United States, who was born, reared, and lives in Pennsylvania, is not familiar with these facts, including the decision of Judge McPherson. It is unnatural and unreasonable to ask me or the American people to believe that he has not turned a deaf ear to these open charges, to these published facts, to these combinations. On the contrary, it is patent that he has closed his eyes to the situation, and that he is deaf to appeals to him to enforce our antitrust laws.

All "publicity" possible has been given in these matters through the press and by parties who swear to the truth of these charges and have regularly filed them with the Attorney-General, Mr. Knox. Yet this "publicity" has not relieved the situation nor induced or forced the Attorney-General to act.

Here is a letter of Mr. Hearst, of the New York Journal, and a copy of the petition and other documents which he has filed with the Attorney-General, Mr. Knox, showing the combination formed by these several railroads—six, I believe—to control the coal output of Pennsylvania in quantity, cost of transportation into other States, and the price for digging, hauling, and selling.

I hope my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] will read these documents, or permit me to read them to him. They are to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 16, 1903, page 882. The gentleman will remember also that I had read here to the House an open letter addressed to the President from Mr. Hearst again briefly and succinctly challenging his attention to these combinations, and the failure of Attorney-General Knox to enforce the law. He appealed to the President to obey his oaths to see that the laws of the United States Government are faithfully executed.

The case against these combinations in the shape of a petition prepared and sworn to by Mr. Hearst have been on file before the distinguished Attorney-General, Mr. Knox, and therefore the President of the United States, since the 4th of last October, and not a single suit has been filed by way of injunction or indictment.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Of these railroads of which the gentleman speaks, if he will permit me, I will say that all except one were incorporated before the adoption of the constitution of 1873, and all of them owned their coal lands, and had the right to own them before that constitution was adopted, and neither the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania nor any other law could take that right away from them or violate the provisions of their charters, or the sanctity of the contracts under which they are doing business.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has not Pennsylvania some antitrust laws? Laws against combinations?

Mr. PALMER. What if we have?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have you?

Mr. PALMER. What has that to do with it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to be informed.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman is complaining because the Attorney-General of the United States does not do an impossible thing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have you any antitrust laws in Pennsylvania?

Mr. PALMER. Suppose we have?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I suppose you have, as the gentleman does not admit the fact. Why does not your attorney-general and your governor enforce the law against these trusts and break up this railroad combination under your antitrust laws?

Mr. PALMER. There is no railroad combination and there is no infringement of the law, so far as I know.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. With all due deference to my friend's statement, here is the oath of Mr. Hearst, sworn to time and again, published time and again, and in it he shows this combination, and that the papers are filed with the Attorney-General of the United States, and have been since last October. Mr. Hearst states that the Attorney-General referred them to Mr. Burnett, United States attorney for the southern district of New York, and that not one thing has been done in this matter down to the present time.

Mr. Hearst goes on further and says that the people tried to form an independent railroad up there, with which to haul the coal from certain mines. Yet these big railroads combined and bought the lands away from them before they got the railroad, and then gobbled up the independent railroad in embryo—I believe it was the Wyoming Railroad or the Wyoming mine—so that the people in Pennsylvania and the East are again in the clutches of these five or six railroad combines.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it is just a plain case where "publicity" does not punish or make officers execute the law.

I do not know when the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania was adopted; but admitting that it is a fact that the railroads of which the gentleman speaks were incorporated before the constitution was made, is it not a fact—and a notorious fact—that this "combination" exists and has been organized in late years, and every day commits new wrongs, crimes, and misdemeanors?

Is it not a notorious fact, Mr. Chairman, that this is against the law—the act of June 2, 1890, and the interstate act? Yet nothing is done to enforce them by State or national officers. Mr. Hearst has given all the "publicity" of actual combination in Federal commerce anybody in the world wants who desires to enforce the law. He has sworn to his petition; he has filed affidavits with it, and he has supported it by certified copies of the combination, I am informed. Here it is all in the RECORD. You see the whole statement for yourselves.

I can not take my time nor the further indulgence of the committee to read this Hearst document. It is published with the petition and affidavits, etc. The gentleman will find this very interesting reading matter in this RECORD. It is perfectly plain, however, that he shows a combination of railroads to control the Pennsylvania coal output, and that the combination is in restraint of Federal commerce.

Only a few days ago the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, brought in a resolution—and I hope my friend now will pay particular attention to what I say—and that resolution went on to say that whereas "it is apparent" there is a "conspiracy to put up the price of coal," etc., and we immediately passed the resolution and appointed the committee to go hence and see about it. This must have been in restraint of Federal commerce. "It is apparent!" How did it become any more "apparent" to him than it did to the Attorney-General with all this information before him? What now has the Attorney-General done?

Mr. PALMER. Oh, it is very cheap and easy to say in a resolution that it is "apparent."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I took the gentleman from Ohio at his word when he spoke thus seriously, just as I do the gentleman who is now addressing me, and so did the House when we heard this resolution read.

Mr. PALMER. The committee has been to Boston?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They have.

Mr. PALMER. And they have investigated?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They have.

Mr. PALMER. And they have not been able to find any combination.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, but I do not read the Boston papers in that way. One of the gentlemen of this committee—I do not know who it was—said "that many a man had been hanged on less testimony" than they received up there showing this railroad and coal conspiracy. This the Boston paper stated.

Mr. PALMER. Oh, well, men have been hanged without any testimony at all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not know whether it was a Democrat or a Republican, Mr. Chairman, who thus spoke of the evidence educed, but the fact remains that one of the members of the committee, as one or two Republican papers of Boston stated, said that "men have been hanged on less testimony than that which they have found," showing the very thing which Mr. Hearst swears to as true is true; that is, that these railroads in Pennsylvania are in a conspiracy not only to own all the coal lands, but to dig all the coal and haul it all and sell it all, and at their prices. That is what he charges. That is what he swears to, and that is what the Attorney-General has had in his hands since the 4th of October, 1902. But what has the Attorney-General done? What is he—the Attorney-General—doing in this matter? Nothing we can see or hear.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, here we are junketing a committee all around the country to find out what Mr. Hearst has already "found" out through his great enterprise; because of his great love of country, his great love of the people. Why, I understand he was elected by many thousands to Congress in his district, a close district. That shows how close he is to the people. They have confidence in him, and the testimony that we have from this investigating committee corroborates what he has charged for the past four months, when the Attorney-General of the United States turned a deaf ear to it, who stands palsied and refuses to enforce the antitrust law of 1890, while the people of this country are freezing for the lack of coal.

Why, I have just been notified that immense cargoes of coal are coming into this country from foreign countries! You gentlemen said free coal would give no relief! Don't you know that you built your tariff to shut out coal? Didn't you? Didn't you succeed? Anthracite coal was on the free list in the Wilson tariff law, and in 1896 importations rose to 146,000 tons under that law, while in 1901, under the Dingley law, there was only one ton—a single ton—of anthracite imported.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, coal was on the free list under the Dingley law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, no.

Mr. PALMER. Oh, yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will show you about that.

Mr. PALMER. What was the tariff on coal under the Wilson bill?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Anthracite was free of duty under the Wilson tariff, and I have a letter of December 5, 1902, from our statistician, Mr. O. P. Austin, stating that fact.

Mr. PALMER. I am informed that the duty in the Wilson bill was 40 cents a ton.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not on anthracite coal. It was free. But 40 cents is less than 67 cents a ton, the rate of the present tariff law.

Mr. MINOR. I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee that if 67 cents is a steal, then 40 cents is a steal just the same.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I disagree with the gentleman, at least to this extent: 40 cents, if that was the rate, was a revenue rate levied to run the Government, while the rate of 67 cents was a rate so high that it prohibits the importation of coal and was not levied for revenue only, but for revenue, protection per se, and reciprocity added, to force reciprocal arrangements which have never been made.

Anthracite coal, however, under the Wilson tariff act was on the free list in the fact and in law, and our coal importations rose from a few tons to about 146,000 tons in 1896, while under the Dingley tariff importations continued to fall until in 1901 there was one single, solitary ton imported, and that came from the Dominion of Canada.

I have found, Mr. Chairman, Mr. O. P. Austin's letter to me of December 5, in which he says: "No anthracite coal was subject to duty under the Wilson act." I have not time to read the whole letter; I will print it in my remarks.

Under the Dingley act anthracite coal was placed literally on the free list in one part of the bill, way over near the end—paragraph 523—over a hundred paragraphs from paragraph 415, where someone, by an adroit use of language and with great knowledge of coal, succeeded in making anthracite dutiable.

Mr. PALMER. Oh, no.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am going to prove to the gentleman that I am right, as usual. [Applause.] Wait a minute. I have here a copy of the present tariff law—the act of 1897. Here is the ostensible "free list" on page 55, and under the heading "free list" there appears the following:

Paragraph 523. Coal, anthracite, not specially provided for in this act, and coal stores of American vessels, but none shall be unloaded.

Now, then, over a hundred paragraphs before paragraph 523, paragraph 415 reads:

Coal, bituminous, and all coals containing less than 92 per cent fixed carbon, and shale, 67 cents per ton of 28 bushels, 80 pounds to the bushel. Coal, slack or culm, such as will pass through a half-inch screen, 15 cents per ton of 28 bushels, 80 pounds to the bushel.

Now, gentlemen, bear in mind this fact: That there is practically no coal outside of the United States (and Mr. Austen says none inside of the United States) which has as much as 92 per cent of fixed carbon in it, and you can readily see the two sections combined operate to tax anthracite coal imported, because coal "with less" than 92 is taxable at 67 cents per ton.

Hence it was that Mr. Moody, late a member of this House, and now our distinguished Secretary of the Navy, denounced the duty on anthracite as having been placed in the Dingley tariff act "in a cowardly and sneaking way."

Paragraph 415 levies a duty of 67 cents if the anthracite contains "less" than 92 per cent fixed carbon, and as there is practically no anthracite coal in existence in foreign countries containing 92 per cent of fixed carbon, hence the great bulk of foreign anthracite coal must contain "less" than 92 per cent, and hence if brought to the United States must pay this duty of 67 cents per ton. In other words, there being no foreign anthracite coal having as much as 92 per cent fixed carbon, it must necessarily have "less" than 92 per cent fixed carbon, if it has any, and if it has "less," under paragraph 415 of the Dingley tariff act, it must pay 67 cents per ton, but if it has as much as 92 per cent fixed carbon, under paragraph 523, it is duty free.

Mr. Austin in this letter to me states that the anthracite coal in the United States ranges from 80 to 87 per cent fixed carbon, and further shows that there are a few Welsh coal mines producing anthracite containing 92 per cent fixed carbon, but I am satisfied that the customs officers would, in practice, hold as dutiable even this coal, which barely contains 92 per cent and a little over of fixed carbon, and I am informed that the customs officers did so hold and tax the little anthracite that was imported previous to our coal famine, but that Mr. Secretary Shaw, to relieve the coal situation in the East, nullified this anthracite tariff and let the coal in free.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. So that by the law saying that coal shall be free in paragraph 523, and saying in another paragraph, 415, that it shall pay a duty if it contains "less" than 92 per cent fixed carbon, when there is no such coal in existence, practically makes anthracite coal necessarily dutiable.

Mr. PALMER. If the gentleman will come up to my country, I will show him a good many thousand acres of land containing coal that has over 92 per cent of fixed carbon.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman that Mr. Austin says that the Geological Survey reports that the anthracite coal in the United States has less than 92 per cent of fixed carbon in it and that it "ranges between 80 and 87 per cent."

Mr. PALMER. You are mistaken about that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Here are the words of Mr. Austin: "According to the office of the Geological Survey, the fixed carbon contained in anthracite coal ranges from 80.87 to 87.98 per cent." That is my authority. If there is any mistake, then there are two Department public officials publishing the mistakes. Now, I want to ask my friend if he voted for the bill taking the tariff off coal the other day?

Mr. PALMER. Suppose I did; what does that have to do with it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did you do that? I would like to know if you did that one good act?

Mr. PALMER. If I did, what would that have to do with it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Ah, there is a multum of talk and a parvum of do with the Republicans on this subject against trusts. [Laughter and applause.]

There is a great amount of palaver all over the country about the trusts. Your President last fall begged the American people to take his words at their "face value," but when he comes back to the White House, Mr. Hearst loads him and his Attorney-General, Mr. Knox, down with proof of a whole lot of interstate trusts and combines controlling coal; they both sit by with arms akimbo, in front of warm fires made of trust-dug coal, trust-hauled coal, trust-owned coal, trust-sold coal—all paid for by the people's money—while the people are freezing on the outside, pointing to those who are guilty of this criminal denial of coal, and yet the President and his Attorney-General refuse to prosecute their oppressors when they have the power and it is their duty to do so.

But more; even after the President had told Congress, what we all really knew, that free anthracite coal would relieve the "coal crisis," weeks and weeks passed before coal was relieved of a robber tax, and then, when the people were freezing here in Washington and elsewhere, the Republicans reluctantly abated the tax for a year only, at the same time saying "that this law would give no relief, that no coal would come here with the duty on or off."

But, thank Heaven, ship loads of foreign coal are daily coming to our shores and relieving the people. The Democratic party and the Lord are on the people's side, as usual.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman asked me a while ago if I voted for the bill taking the duty off coal. I guess I did. I always vote with the gentleman from Tennessee when he votes right, which is seldom.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am glad you did. That which is right is done on your side of the House, but it is not often. But even in this case the Republicans were whipped into action by the demands of the Democrats who represented the appealing masses on the outside and not until then.

I am very glad that my friend has confessed that he voted for this measure, even though he had to guess at what he did. I want to preserve in the RECORD, as without alcoholic effect, anything which the Republicans here in Congress do for the good of the whole country. I do not have the chance often.

Now, does the gentleman state that we can find anthracite coal in his country showing 92 per cent fixed carbon?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; more.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you mean to say that there is anthracite coal outside of this country, in any amount, having 92 per cent fixed carbon in it?

Mr. PALMER. In Luzerne County, Pa., it shows more, and that county is in the United States, as I understand it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Outside of the United States, I asked. I want to get the gentleman to where the trouble is. We did not prohibit anything in Pennsylvania. I wish the Democrats could. The trouble is up there that we can not prohibit anything bad. [Laughter.] I wish we could, because it would make you a good people and keep you out of a constant state of revolution up there. [Laughter and applause.] My question was with reference to coal outside of the United States having 92 per cent fixed carbon, and not coal in Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I had just reached Wales in my argument [laughter], and I really want now to get to print with my remarks these letters which I have here, showing the per cent of carbon in Welsh coal and in our coal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to have five minutes just to finish this matter.

Mr. PALMER. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to finish his interesting discussion, and I ask unanimous consent that he may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, here is a letter, including others, dated December 5, 1902, addressed to me by O. P. Austin, chief of the Bureau of Statistics, and I want to read it for the information of the gentleman, and insert the inclosure in the RECORD:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, December 5, 1902.

Hon. J. W. GAINES,
1325 G street NW., Washington, D. C.

SIR: Since writing the letter to the Journal Company, Crawfordsville, Ind., a copy of which is inclosed, I have ascertained the following information with respect to per cent of carbon contained in certain classes of South Wales anthracite coal:

Analyses of South Wales anthracite coal.

District.	Per cent of carbon.	District.	Per cent of carbon.
Neath Abbey	91.08	Gwendraeth in Caermarthenshire	92.17
Swansea	89.60	Caermarthen:
Ystalyfera	92.46	Pontyeats	91.16
Cwm Neath	93.12	Big Vein	88.70
Brass vein of the Cwm Cynfell colliery in Glamorganshire	91.44	Pembroke	92.17
Bonville Court in Pembrokeshire	94.18

H. W. Hughes's Text-book of Coal Mining, 1896, reports South Wales coal near Swansea 92.56 per cent, and other South Wales coal generally, 90.39 per cent carbon.

According to the office of the Geological Survey, the fixed carbon contained in American anthracite coal ranges from 80.87 to 87.98 per cent.

Very respectfully,

O. P. AUSTIN, Chief of Bureau.

MEMORANDUM.

During the four months ending with October last, the anthracite coal free of duty imported was 18,266 tons; value, $85,634. The imports of anthracite coal decided to be subject to duty during the same period were 31,703 tons; value, $135,970.

The rate of duty collected is 67 cents per ton, the same as on bituminous coal, if not slack or culm such as will pass through a half-inch screen. On the latter the duty is 15 cents per ton. I am unable at present to state just how much duty has been collected during the four months indicated, but it is probable that it can be figured that on most of the dutiable 67 cents per ton has been collected.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, October 22, 1902.

The JOURNAL COMPANY,
Crawfordsville, Ind.

SIRS: In response to your favor of the 16th instant to the Secretary of the Treasury, referred to this office, with respect to imported coal, I have to reply as follows:

The Wilson tariff act went into effect August 28, 1894, and the Dingley tariff act July 24, 1897.[a] During this period covered by the two acts, as nearly as the fiscal year corresponds to it, the imports of anthracite coal for consumption, returned to this Bureau by collectors of customs, were as follows:

Anthracite coal.

Year ending June 30—	Tons.	Value.
UNDER WILSON ACT.
1895	80,215	$304,627
1896	149,629	345,964
1897	86,880	202,923
UNDER DINGLEY ACT.
1898	5,866	14,804
1899	601	2,686
1900	142	628
1901	1	6

No anthracite coal was subject to duty under the Wilson Act, and collectors have returned none as subject to duty under the Dingley Act, except a few tons during the current fiscal year not shown above.

I am unable to inform you how much foreign anthracite coal contains more than 92 per cent of fixed carbon, nor am I able to inform you to what extent the tariff benefits the coal trust, nor why the clause with respect to the percentage of carbon, which makes anthracite coal dutiable, was inserted in the Dingley law.

It will be impossible to state whether the Welsh coal, mentioned in your letter as on the way to this country now, will have to pay duty until it has been appraised at the ports into which it may be imported.

The first importation of dutiable anthracite coal reported by collectors to this Bureau was during the month of September last. The amount was very small.

Very respectfully,

J. N. WHITNEY,
Acting Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, December 5, 1902.

Hon. J. W. GAINES, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I hope you will pardon the delay in sending you the matter which I yesterday promised should reach you before noon to-day. A slight delay occurred by reason of the fact that some new matter regarding the percentage of carbon contained in certain South Wales anthracite coal had just become available, and you will find it in the accompanying statement.

I am sorry that I am unable to give you the importations of anthracite coal by months prior to July, 1897. I now recall that I found, on taking charge of the Bureau in May, 1897, that anthracite coal was not stated separately in the monthly publications of the Bureau, but only in its annual publications, and I gave instructions that beginning with the fiscal year then just at hand anthracite should be separately stated in each month as well as annually. Our printed reports, therefore, only state the total importation of anthracite annually down to July, 1897, and monthly as well as annually since that date. I therefore give you a table showing the monthly figures, beginning with July, 1897, and a page from one of our printed volumes giving the annual figures as far back as 1892.

Very respectfully,

O. P. AUSTIN,
Chief of Bureau.

O. P. AUSTIN, Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
December 5, 1902.

Mr. Chairman, the impartial eye, at a mere glance at the letter of Mr. Austin and the exhibits to it, can see that for all practical purposes there is no anthracite coal in the United States, or outside of the United States, which contains 92 per cent of fixed carbon, and that the customs office, as I stated, would resolve all doubts against the foreign anthracite coal from Wales, and did do so last summer, and exclude it.

You can also see that whoever drew these two coal paragraphs, Nos. 415 and 523, knew all about coal, the carbon in it, and what he was doing.

He knew that there was practically no coal that could come up to the standard of 92 per cent of carbon, and that if the latter was so drawn as to tax it if it contained "less" than 92 per cent, practically all anthracite would pay 67 cents tax per ton.

This legislative operation was skillful. It takes a skilled surgeon to cut a limb off without the loss of blood. A butcher means to draw blood and lose it. You do not hear the sharp knife of the surgeon splitting flesh, but you do hear the blow of the butcher with a broadax. So it was unknown at the time the Dingley law was being framed, to many members of Congress at least, that this tax was imposed.

Its repeal a few days ago is a confession that anthracite coal was not on the "free list" and was dutiable.

FREE LIST TO KILL TRUSTS.

Mr. Chairman, a few words more and I am done. It is contended by my friend from Pennsylvania and many other Representatives, at least those members in favor of the trusts and combines, that in destroying the trusts you destroy "commerce." I maintain, in destroying the trusts you destroy dishonest commerce and leave honest commerce to prosper as it did before the days of trusts and combines, the outgrowth of protective tariff and the nonenforcement of our antitrust laws.

When General Garfield, a distinguished Republican and once a member of this House, and still later elected President of the United States, wanted to crush the salt monopoly, he said, put salt on the free list. A monopoly, he said, was making salt in New York and selling it in Canada—just across Lake Ontario—a dollar a ton less than the same salt was being sold to the people in New York and the United States. He said that they transported it from the United States to Canada, paying the cost of transportation, insurance, license, wharfage, all the expenses, and then sold the salt at less than they did to our own people. He denounced, and properly, such commerce, such an immoral and un-American and unjust act.

He was not alone in this denunciation, for by his side stood a distinguished Representative from the State of Maine, at that time a Representative in this House, Mr. HALE, now Senator HALE. He, too, denounced this salt monopoly in no uncertain terms, indeed, in the most vigorous language, and insisted that salt be put on the free list.

Here is no mean authority to cite in favor of the position the Democrats take to prevent trusts and combines from being formed hereafter and to destroy unlawful commerce that now exists in the United States.

But I now cite my friend from Pennsylvania and the committee to a most notable example of where a monopoly was crushed and thereafter the legitimate business of making quinine continued. You will remember when quinine was selling at $5 and $10 an ounce that a distinguished Kentuckian, Mr. McKenzie, a Democrat, said "put quinine on the free list." It was done. The quinine monopoly was crushed, but the legitimate quinine business continued and prospered, and does to-day, and the people all over this country can now buy quinine for half—yes, at 25 and 50 cents an ounce. We have a legitimate, honest, prosperous quinine business, and not the illegitimate, dishonest, prosperous quinine monopoly denying the people this most valuable medicine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for the great courtesy they have extended. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SPERRY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 12316. An act granting an increase of pension to Weden O'Neal;

H. R. 8650. An act for the relief of the estate of Leander C. McLelland, deceased;

H. R. 9360. An act for the improvement and care of Confederate Mound, in Oakwoods Cemetery, Chicago, Ill., and making an appropriation therefor;

H. R. 8238. An act for the relief of the heirs of Mary Clark and Francis or Jenny Clark, deceased, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 288. An act for relief of the Christian Church of Henderson, Ky.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. JAMES MCMILLAN, late a Senator from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect at the conclusion of these exercises the Senate adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11858. An act for the relief of William E. Anderson.

H. R. 1147. An act for the relief of the First Baptist Church of Cartersville, Ga.

H. R. 16333. An act to change and fix the time for holding district and circuit courts of the United States for the eastern division of the eastern district of Arkansas.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 342. An act for the relief of the heirs of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 6973. An act authorizing the city of Nome, a municipal corporation organized and existing under chapter 21, Title III, of an act of Congress approved June 6, 1900, entitled "An act making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes," to construct a free bridge across the Snake River at Nome City, in the Territory of Alaska—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, during the last campaign we heard a great deal about Republican prosperity caused by the Republican tariff, which, in its turn, had caused an increase of price for American manufactured goods, thereby enabling the American manufacturer to pay to American labor a high wage if he wanted to. I believe I make a fair statement of the contention on the stump by Republican campaign orators during that contest, and perhaps by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] himself.

It was therefore with much wonder and astonishment and some degree of sympathy that I heard the gentleman from Connecticut this morning demolish the entire theory upon which his party had won the last fight. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] was either trying to say something, or he was trying to say nothing. He was either trying to pick flaws in the mere accuracy in details of figures and classification in a Democratic campaign book, or else he was taking them as true and building up an argument upon them.

The former horn of the dilemma I shall not consider, because I know the gentleman's frankness too well to think him capable of mere carping. I shall therefore take it for granted that he meant something, and if he meant anything at all, in producing words and figures, he meant to produce them fairly, and he meant them to mean what he said they meant, and that was this:

That, so far from the Republican tariff having increased prices, thereby enabling the Republican manufacturers to pay American labor better prices—provided, of course, they were willing to pay them, an impossible supposition—the truth was that articles upon the free list have advanced more in price than articles upon the protected list, and therefore, according to the Republican theory, people who were producing articles on the free list earned more money for their products and were thereby enabled to pay better wages than protected manufacturers producing protected articles, provided, of course, the manufacturers made richer were willing to pay more.

That is not all, Mr. Chairman. I think it is time we were finding out whether some other Republican ideas are fallacies or not. The gentleman from Connecticut did not produce quite a fair list, because of course the gentleman knew that anthracite coal was not upon the free list.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I refuse to take it for granted now that the gentleman did not mean what he said.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman says I was not fair in my quotation, but does the gentleman state that I did not quote accurately?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman quoted perfectly accurately—I did not mean to say that he did not quote fairly. I was not paying attention to my words. I mean the gentleman did not properly take his figures, and that he did not believe in his figures, not in his conclusion from them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly easy to go around and take up a figure here and a figure there and make figures prove almost anything. Somebody said figures never lie, but Macaulay said that figures were the only facts that could nearly always lie—it depended on who used them. Now, my friend has selected a list of articles.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Minnesota means to be fair?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, certainly.

Mr. HILL. Did I not take every article in the entire free list furnished in the Democratic campaign text-book? Did I not take every article upon the free list without exception?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; but not every one which was taken as upon the protected list. [Applause.] You did not arrive at any average down the line. And when you took the figures given by the Democratic campaign book as to articles on the free list, you took at least three articles, as I recollect, about which the Democratic campaign book had made a mistake—anthracite coal for one—and the Democratic campaign book is not to be blamed for making a mistake about anthracite coal being on the free list, because the President of the United States himself, who lives so strenuous a life that he ought to find out everything, did not find out, until after he had made a campaign speech to the contrary, that there was a duty on anthracite coal. The Secretary of the Navy also announced in a public speech that anthracite was on the free list. The Dingley bill reads at first blush as if anthracite coal were free, but it bore until the other day a duty of 67 cents. It reads at first blush as if kerosene oil, out of which the great Standard Oil Company has been formed into almost a monopoly, were also upon the free list.

But I know it is not, and the gentleman from Connecticut knows that it is not. The Dingley bill, on the contrary, imposes practically a very high protective tariff upon oil, because it says that it shall be free, except when coming from countries which levy a duty upon oil imported to their shores; and about the only country in the world that makes oil for export, except the United States, is Russia, and it imposes an abnormally high import duty upon oil, and therefore we levy in return an abnormally high import duty upon the only sort of oil we can import.

Binder's twine has the same kind of a provision in the Dingley bill, so that it could not be said to be altogether upon the free list.

Now, I am going to take some figures which I am going to select for exactly the opposite purpose, and perhaps the two exhibits taken together may answer one another. I want to take the very sheet from which my friend from Connecticut read. I turn to wire nails. I find here, first, that the gentleman's quotations of prices is literally correct; but the gentleman will excuse me for reminding him that he took as a starting point the high mid-July price of 1896, when nails were at an abnormally high price, and before the formation of the trust which the gentleman argues could not have controlled the prices.

Now, then, everybody knows that a trust starts off by lowering prices in order to drive competitors out of business, and after this trust was in control it lowered its prices for two years, until it had almost a monopoly of the American market, and after that the price increased regularly up to 1902, as these figures quoted by the gentleman show. Now, then, if the gentleman, instead of starting with the year before the Dingley tariff bill was brought in, will start with the year upon which that bill went into operation and had its effect, he will find a steady increase in the price of these wire nails. So his argument against the power of trust and tariff artificially to raise prices falls to the ground.

But, talking about the products of the steel trust, let us refer to some more of these articles: Anvils, Peter Wright's, 1897, $0.1025; 1902, ibid. Angles, per 100 pounds at tide, 1897, $1.20; 1902, $3.75. Axes, first quality and best brand, 1897, $5.25; 1902, $7; other brands quoted from Hardware, 1897, $4.75, but in 1902, $6.50. Barbed wire, galvanized, 1897, $1.90; 1902, $3.10. Chains, 1897, $6.60; 1902, $8. Pig iron, 1897, $10; 1902, $14.65. Pig iron, Foundry No. 1, 1897, $12.75; 1902, $16.75. Steel rails, 1897, $25; 1902, $28. Steel billets at Pittsburg, 1897, $15.90; 1902, $27.50. Steel beams at tidewater, 1897, $1.70; 1902, $1.75. Steel bars at tidewater, 1897, $1.05; 1902, $1.70. Shovels, Ames No. 2, 1897, $7.93; 1902, $9.12. Tin plates, 1897, $3.50, and in 1902, $4.19. All these are subject to the prices dictated by the present steel trust.

Then I come to barbed wire, which the farmer must use all the time, which has risen from $2.02 in 1896 and $1.90 in 1897 to $3.10 in 1902, over 50 per cent.

I might add, controlled by other combines:

Boots, per dozen, in 1897, $16; in 1901, $18; and sold cheaper abroad.

White pine boards, at Buffalo, in 1897, sold at $16; in 1902, at $25.

I might add indefinitely, in nine cases out of ten supporting my contention and disappointing the wish—father to the conclusion—of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], other articles of iron and steel.

To show that it is the tariff and trust price and not the natural and normal price of these tariff-protected and trust-monopolized goods which has risen, every article—plows and harvesters and reapers and cotton gins and cotton-mill machinery—all virtually in the same category—are sold nearly at the 1897 price abroad and at the enhanced price at home.

Now, as to anthracite coal. Like the gentleman, I will not come down to the price at this time, because, to take the last price would not, I think, be dealing fairly with this question. But the price rose during the entire period—even excepting last year——

Mr. HILL. I stated distinctly that in making the average I excluded anthracite coal, because I did not think it fair to include it, and that if I had put it in it would have made the advance on free-list articles 74 per cent instead of 26 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But I said a moment ago that, like the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], I would not include it, because it was not upon the free list and because its inclusion would have proved the opposite of what he said it would have proved if he had included it. That is the difference.

Now, let us take the subject of horse nails. I hear a great deal, Mr. Chairman, now and then about "protecting American labor" and how "American labor" is "protected" by a tariff—all folderol on both sides, as every informed man knows. Take a blacksmith, for example, or take a bricklayer. How in the name of common sense does the American tariff make the wages of a blacksmith or bricklayer larger than the wages of men in similar pursuits in Europe? And yet they are greater.

I will tell you the only way in the world in which the tariff affects the American blacksmith. It makes him pay about 40 per cent, I believe it is, more for his nails than the same American company, making the same nails, sells them for to his British cousin in London and in the other towns of Great Britain and upon the continent of Europe. Horse nails went up in price during the Dingley tariff period from 0.09 to 1.05 cents. Steel rails went up from $25 to $28, beginning with 1897, after the Dingley Act went into operation.

Mr. HILL. Is the gentleman not mistaken? Steel rails remained at $28 straight through, according to Democratic authority.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, they did not.

Mr. HILL. As I remember. I have not the figures.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman is again mistaken. In 1896 steel rails were, it is true, $28.

Mr. HILL. What were they in 1902?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let me continue. When the trusts had taken hold of them, they drove down the price of rails to shut out competitors, but steel rails rose from $18 in 1898 to $28 in 1902.

Mr. HILL. Just exactly what they were in 1896.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. HILL. And are to-day the same price.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; but they ought to be very much below that.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman explain the effect on steel rails of the tariff or the trusts?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am going to prove to the gentleman that they ought to be down where they were in 1897, viz, $25, when the tariff began to have effect, or in 1898, viz, $18 when the trusts began to have effect. I have here the testimony of President Charles M. Schwab. He admitted to the Industrial Commission last May that in May, 1901, steel rails were exported at an average price of about $23 a ton, when the domestic price was $26 and $28, a difference of from $3 to $4, and the foreign price now being the American price of 1897 and less by $3.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it frequently happens that the tendency of a law is counteracted by the general trend of events. It frequently happens that although the trend and tendency of a protective tariff law are to enable a manufacturer to charge more to the consumer than he otherwise could, the real effect from other cause is that his prices are driven down somewhat, but that he is still enabled to get more than he could have gotten if the tariff law were not in operation.

Whenever a man is able to pay freight 3,000 miles across the Atlantic and still sell rails there at $23 and $24, that is a proof that that is the normal price for steel rails, plus freight, unless you take the position that the manufacturer sells rails at a loss. But they have been doing this, according to Mr. Schwab's testimony, not upon one particular occasion to get rid of a surplus, but for six years, and men do not carry on that sort of movement for that length of time simply to amuse themselves.

Mr. Chairman, a tariff law that fails to raise prices has failed of the purpose of the law. A trust that fails to raise prices or else to lower the wages of labor, one of the two, has failed of the purpose of the organization of a trust. A trust is formed not for a philanthropic purpose, not for the amusement of the various corporations that enter into it, but for the plain business reason of making money.

Now, there are only these methods in which an aggregation of corporations can make more money in the production of a given commodity than one of the corporations by itself could have made; they must make it by getting their wages for less, or by employing fewer laborers, by being able to present a consolidated front to the demands of labor when labor wants increased wages, or else by their power to decrease wages. That is one way. Another way is to control the price of the raw material, which must sell in an approximately monopolized market. A third way is to raise the price to the consumer by artificial means higher than the natural and normal demand and supply price in the market, and therefore take in more money.

Now, there is no other way under the sun, except to raise prices, reduce the price of labor or reduce the volume of labor, or control the price of raw material in an approximately monopolized market. Sometimes they merely decrease the volume of labor. How? Why, there is a factory in the town of my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], there is another in the town of my friend from Virginia, and there is another in the town of my friend from Georgia, one man carrying on each business in the same line.

The trust is then formed. They close down the Georgia and the Connecticut plant and keep them idle, throwing out of work all the locally employed people, and continue their work with an increased volume of business and a decreased aggregate of labor at the other two plants. In this event, the consolidation makes money by decreasing the number of employees and plants. In the other cases supposed the process is self-evident. Now, unless a man takes the absolutely insane position that these great combinations of corporations are made for philanthropy or for fun, or just for pastime, he must admit that they are formed to make money, and he must admit that they can not make money in any other than in one of the ways that I have indicated. They must do one of those things or else they must fail of their purpose. If so, all trusts must be bad trusts, and there can be no "good trusts." Their purposes are bad, and contrary to sound public policy. Now and then one, of course, fails of its purpose.

But what I want to get at to-day is this: It seems to me that my friends upon the Republican side are shifting too much. They used to tell us long ago that the object of a protective tariff—I used to express it by saying that the object of a protective tariff was a sort of eleemosynary object to tax the great body of the consumers in order that more prosperity might be given to American manufacturers in order to hothouse into immediate and artificial prosperity certain industries at the expense of the general consumer, diverting American capital from naturally unprofitable channels to channels made profitable by legislation and with capital, its attendant, labor; but our Republican friends used to answer that by saying, "This is but a slight tax. The people ought to be philanthropic and patriotic and 'national' enough to enable America to have her own manufactures, and in order to do it the American manufacturer ought to be put in possession of the home market."

Now, during the last campaign they told us that the American manufacturer was already in possession of the home market and that he was marching on "conquering and to conquer." Then when we said, "Then you have accomplished your object," they said, "Oh, no; we want now to tax the American consumer in order to put the manufacturer in possession of the foreign market, to fix it so that while he perhaps levies a higher price within his protected field upon the American consumer he may sell a great volume of goods at a living rate to the foreigner, and thereby gradually take possession of and conquer 'the markets of the world.'"

Now, what I want my Republican friends on the other side of this aisle to do is this: I want them to line themselves up on some sort of a theory, either the old Henry Clay theory of "protecting infant industries;" and then we will object to these gray-haired, brawny-armed fellows who not only own everything around them, but are selling to South Africa and to Great Britain herself.

They must either take that position or they must take the philanthropic and patriotic pretense position that the balance of the community can "well afford" to tax itself "a little" in order that "America may support her own manufactures," or they must take the "Vanderlip theory," that we are going to keep up the protective tariff "in order to conquer the foreign field," or they must take the "Hill theory," that things upon the free list advance more rapidly in price than things upon the protected list, and therefore furnish more money out of which to pay American labor. I do not care which you take, but take one or take the other. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, even a Democrat can not shoot in more than one direction at the same time. [Laughter.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And then he can not hit anything.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And then he likes to know where his enemy is, so as to know if he has anything to shoot at. Now, my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] would be the last man in the world to contend that a comparison between goods on the free list on one side and goods upon the protected list upon the other side can be arrived at in any other way than by taking the entire volume of one and the entire volume of the other and then taking the average price upon each during a period of some considerable time. I do not care where it is, gentlemen, but wherever there is an article upon the free list a trust approximating a monopoly in that article can not be formed, except in so far as the company may be protected by international freight rates. It can not be formed.

Gentlemen say that there are trusts in Great Britain. If they mean by that that there are combinations of capital and aggregations of corporations, yes, of course, as there are everywhere, but there has never been formed the thing that we are fighting. "The thing we call a rose by any other name would smell as sweet." We know what we are fighting. We are fighting these great aggregations of corporate power which succeed in monopolizing or so nearly monopolizing the production of a given article as to be able practically to fix their own price upon it, or else practically to buy at their own price the raw material of the American farmer, or else control by shut-downs the labor employed—one of those three things.

Now, it would be impossible under the natural law to form a world aggregation of capital, I do not care how much or powerfully extended, that could practically control world prices, or that could practically dictate prices of world raw material; because the moment you attempt to form one in a free-trade country based on the control of raw material, England, for example, the great leviathans of the deep would plow the broad Atlantic laden with raw materials from America, laden with raw materials from the Baltic, Germany, and the balance of the world. And if a trust attempted to make its prices higher than the natural and normal prices fixed by God's law of supply and demand throughout the world, then the same great leviathans of the deep would bring the finished product in every succeeding day to tear down prices, and that little scheme would "die a-borning."

Mr. SIBLEY. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to an interruption?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. SIBLEY. I read from page 277 of the Democratic campaign book what it says on the theory of free trade:

> The theory of free trade is that both seller and buyer are benefited by an exchange of commodities, and that, as all are consumers, the greatest good to the greatest number requires that there be no barriers to trade in order that goods may be as cheap as possible and the cost of living be reduced to a minimum.

I would like to know if the gentleman subscribes to that theory?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand the question, or the result at which the gentleman would arrive. Now, I am free to admit that one Republican contention is true. You can build up an industry by a protective tariff [applause on the Republican side] if you are willing to have the public pay the price. That is what you want to arrive at, is it not?

Mr. SIBLEY. Just one word more. I want to ask the gentleman this other question. Did not you and myself and Mr. Bryan go through these United States, from one ocean to the other, advocating free silver because we said it would raise the price of every product that human toil created, and that that was necessary to stop the stagnation and paralysis that existed at that time? Now, then, you admit that free trade lowers prices; then we were demanding free silver to raise prices.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman is now taking that old cardinal fallacy that Adam Smith disposed of long, long years ago, and which has been out of existence since then except in the minds of men making a political argument. There is no blessing or curse in low or high prices per se. It depends upon what produces the high prices and what produces the low prices. A decreasing price brought about by improved methods of production, by cheapened processes—new inventions, for example—is always a blessing to humanity; decreased prices brought about by artificial legislative means enhancing the value of money are always a curse to humanity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Increased prices brought about by levying a toll upon products is always a curse to humanity. [Renewed applause.] A tariff levies a toll. Low prices brought about by the invention of new labor-saving machinery and increased lines of transportation and transportation facilities, thereby cheapening the tax upon the product from the producer to the consumer, is always a blessing to humanity. [Applause.] Now, I do not know what the gentleman said in the campaign referred to. I know I did not say what he suggests. I believe the gentleman has about as good sense as I have, and I do not believe that the gentleman ever went from the Atlantic to the Pacific or the Lakes to the Gulf preaching the bare, bald doctrine that enhancement of price, in itself, was a blessing to the world.

Mr. SIBLEY. I would ask the gentleman if 8.71 for cotton is not a blessing, and if this price and that wider market for the uses of it are not largely responsible for the condition that now exists in the sunny Southland. Instead of the 4.71 under the free-trade bill, you are getting 8.71 for your cotton now.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; and we got 4 cents under the McKinley bill. Mr. Chairman, I am absolutely astonished at my friend from Pennsylvania. If there is any circumstance in all the world that shows what American brawn and American combination and American brain can do unassisted by government, it is the success of cotton culture in the South. There never has been a day in the history of the South that 1 per cent of the enhancement of the price of cotton came from a tariff. All that the tariff ever had to do with the cotton planter and the laborer in the cotton field was to increase the price either had to pay for plows, scrapers, shovels, axes, hoes, barbed wire, harness, gearing, gins, cleaners, and cotton-oil mill machinery.

We have sold our cotton in Liverpool, we have sold it in competition with the so-called pauper labor of India that works at one-tenth of what our labor works for, we have sold it against the pauper labor that shelters itself under the shadow of the pyramids, under English organizations and capitalization, and we have held our own in all and every country.

Mr. Chairman, the protective tariff has made the difference between American wages and British wages, has it? If so, why was it that American wages in colonial times, when we were a part of Great Britain and when every law was in favor of Great Britain against ourselves and in favor of every English manufacturer and farmer against ourselves, that the wages of the American mechanic, the wages of the American woodmen, the wages of the American worker of every sort in the farm and in the field and in the mines were greater than they were in Great Britain? Why is it that the difference between the two scales of wages was greater then than it is now?

Let me ask another question. Why is it that the wages in highly protected continental countries like Austria, France, and Germany are less than they are in Great Britain with free trade? Do you expect by that that I intend to leave the impression that it is because of the protective tariff? No; I try to preserve my intellectual integrity at every hazard. It does not prove that free trade makes higher wages; it does not mean that protective tariff produces higher wages. I will tell you what it proves. It proves that neither one of them has anything to do with it. What does make high wages? God's eternal law of supply and demand. As Bourke Cockran said, "When two jobs are hunting one man, wages are high; when two men are hunting one job, wages are low."

There is something else, however, Mr. Chairman, if I have got the time to tell about it, and that has something to do with wages, because when I make the statement that the demand for labor and supply of labor fixes the price of labor, then you ask me why is it under this eternal law the wages for Americans are higher than in Great Britain and that the wages in Great Britain are higher than they are in Prussia and Austria and France. Why is it that the demand for labor should be brisker here and in Great Britain after us, next to the colonies of Great Britain, than in other countries? I tell you it is because the supply of labor is less. It is less in Great Britain than in the other settled countries except ourselves. I am leaving out of consideration the British colonies.

Why is it the supply of labor in the shop and in the factory and in the mine is less in proportion with us, and after us in Great Britain, than the supply of labor anywhere else on the globe? In order to answer we have got to get back to that old principle enunciated by Ricardo and indorsed by that great democratic man, that great prescient genius whom I admire more every day that I live, Thomas Jefferson [applause on the Democratic side], that, everything else being equal, wages will be high where land is cheap and wages will be low in that country where land is high. Why? Because of the natural law of preference that man goes to agricultural pursuits when he cheaply and profitably can.

Mr. SIBLEY. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will yield.

Mr. SIBLEY. The gentleman has mentioned the name of that great statesman, Thomas Jefferson. I want to ask him if Jefferson, about 1814, if I recollect right, did not write a letter recanting all his former free-trade theories and say that new conditions had arisen which led him to modify his opinions on that subject which he had theretofore expressed?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not think he ever did. I never heard of his suffering from temporary insanity in his life; I do not think it ever occurred. I think the gentleman is mistaken. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me a suggestion?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will.

Mr. BOUTELL. Right in that connection, with the gentleman's admiration for the opinion of Thomas Jefferson and in connection with his interest in the welfare of the laboring man and the interest of the Democratic party in the welfare of the American workman, will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to a letter of Thomas Jefferson to the Hon. John Jay, written August 28, 1785, and courteously marked "Private." It reminds me of the communications of this distinguished gentleman on the subject of the annexation of Louisiana when it was all to be used sub silentio. In speaking of his desire to keep the country an agricultural country, which seems to be the desire of my Democratic brethren ever since——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, no; not when by natural evolution and without the assistance of laws artificially hothousing other industries, it becomes otherwise.

Mr. BOUTELL (reading):

> Our citizens will find employment in this line (agriculture) till their numbers, and of course their productions, become too great for the demand, both internal and foreign. This is not the case as yet, and probably will not be for a considerable time. As soon as it is the surplus of hands must be turned to something else. I should then perhaps wish to turn them to the sea in preference to manufactures because, comparing the characters of the two classes, I find the former the most valuable citizen.

Now, here is the opinion of the founder of the Democratic party on the subject of the American workman and the American mechanic—an opinion which the gentleman from Mississippi says he has followed in his admiration for this great man:

> I consider the class of artificers as the panders of vice and the instruments by which the liberties of a country are generally overturned.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, Homer said that Jove himself sometimes nodded. Pope says:

> Be Homer's works your study and delight.
> Read them by day and meditate by night.

And yet we are told Homer did himself sometimes nod. [Applause.] That reminds me of another great man who has nodded—a man of a strenuous life, who said that he regarded the cowboy as an infinitely higher specimen of humanity than the man working patiently at his plow or at his anvil supporting a wife and raising children for the Republic. [Applause.] From the way you Republicans are at present fighting organized labor I think you perhaps want me to agree in a great man's temporary aberration of expression. But that has nothing to do with this question. I am trying to discuss a proposition on which I indorsed Mr. Jefferson's opinion, whose character and whose general opinions I also indorse.

I do not know which is the highest class of people on the surface of the earth, although I have a sort of class feeling that God's own creatures are the men who are closest to the ground, and that men generally, like the giant Antæus, gather strength—moral, mental, and physical—from contact with mother earth. I believe that agriculture in its happy condition, is the noblest, purest, healthiest, and highest pursuit of man. [Applause.] But I do not believe that artificers, or merchants, or preachers, or anybody else are any worse than they can help being. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, let me go on with this theory about land and wages.

Mr. LOUD. I will remind the gentleman that in three minutes the Committee of the Whole must rise, in order that the House may take up the special order fixed for 3 o'clock. I suggest that the gentleman can conclude his remarks at some other time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think I can finish this line of remark in three minutes; at any rate, I will try. If I do not, I will shove into the RECORD my favorite plan for starting the banana industry in this country. I want to show how, by levying a duty of a dollar apiece on bananas, every man can get a home-produced banana at 90 cents' cost, and this, too, without raising the price of labor employed in raising bananas, while promoting the prosperity of the persons whose capital may be employed in raising the bananas in hothouses. [Laughter.]

Now, let me go on. If you take a country where land is cheap to buy or to rent, men are going into agriculture, as far as they can, because it is the most enticing, natural, normal, healthy, primitive, and attractive life; and the men who are enticed out of agriculture—who are engaged in the mine or the factory—will have to be paid higher prices. If you take a country where land can be rented for $1 an acre and bought for $5 or $6 or $15 or $50 an acre, the men who are even already operatives, working in factories, can better withstand the demand of the manufacturer than in lands where land sells at $500 or $1,000, and the manufacturer can better afford to raise wages, even to the artificer, rather than to shut down.

Even when the artificial period of organized labor has come, if the manufacturer or the mine owner wants the man working in the mine to receive less than he ought to receive, the laborer can respond, if land and rents are low, "No; I can go and buy for a very small amount of money a few acres sufficient for a home; or if I can not buy the land, I can rent it;" and down in the good State of Mississippi to-day he can say, "I can go to Mr. WILLIAMS, or some other planter, who will furnish me a mule on credit, and supply me with a place to put in a cotton and corn crop, a home to live in, a garden spot for vegetables, a cow lot, general plantation pasturage, all the wood I need for cooking and fuel, a wagon to haul it, my family supplies on a credit, team and implements and home and garden and fuel without charge, and all I will have to pay him will be one-half of the gross proceeds of the common venture of his land and capital and brain and my brawn and muscle and brain," and how can you oppress labor under such circumstances? How could either capital or organized labor oppress it? Two men are hunting one job with the "land vent," as Mark Smith aptly calls it, to help labor.

Now, why is it that Great Britain has, next to America, the highest wage scale? Because the British nation possesses, next to America, a larger body of fertile and cheap land than any other country upon the globe, and although those lands are in Australia, in Cape Colony, and in Canada, still it is true that there is hardly an Englishman who has not a cousin or a brother or a father or a son that has gone to the colonies. So that is just like moving from Connecticut to Ohio, or from Ohio to Mississippi—just like our interstate immigration movements.

As long as you can keep down the supply of labor in the factories and in the mines by keeping a safety-valve of escape toward the farm and the field, towards cheap land to buy or to rent—as long as you can maintain a "land vent," so long are you going to have high wages; and when you can not, when you have settled this country so densely that you can not do that, your wages will not possess the advantage that they do to-day, nor any advantage, except that proceeding from organized labor, in union, intelligently and firmly directed. Now, there is another reason. Wherever land is cheap to rent or buy, wherever men feel free and are filled with an incentive and with hope in their hearts, there they work better.

They do not work as though they were chained like slaves to the galley, to do a certain task to-day and then quit, merely to earn their wages, but each man was taught when he was a boy that he may be a millionaire some day, or the President of the United States, or a Congressman even. [Laughter.] So he works with hope in his heart, hope singing merrily and ambition spurring him like a good rider on a thoroughbred steed, and he is not like those in the class of labor found, for instance, in Austria, who know that all they can do is to get money enough to buy their food and raiment and a glass of beer or two after the day is over and have enough left to pay three kreutzers to sit in the park and listen to Strauss's band. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. GROSVENOR] having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16990, the Post-Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REPRINT.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be a reprint of the bill H. R. 16990, the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that there be a reprint of the Post-Office appropriation bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SCHIRM was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of David E. Kaller, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

STATUES OF CHARLES CARROLL AND JOHN HANSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in session pursuant to the special order of the House, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. PEARRE, by unanimous consent,

Resolved, That the exercises appropriate to the reception and acceptance from the State of Maryland of the statues of Charles Carroll of Carrollton and John Hanson, erected in the Statuary Hall, in the Capitol, be made the special order for Saturday, January, 31, 1903, at 3 o'clock p. m.—Order made in the House Wednesday, December 17, 1902.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the letter of the governor of Maryland, which has been read heretofore in this House and laid upon the table, be taken from the table and read again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will report the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Annapolis, Md., December 15, 1902.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to inform you that in acceptance of the invitation contained in section 1814 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the general assembly of Maryland, by chapter 311 of the Acts of 1898, made an appropriation to procure statues of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and John Hanson, President of the Continental Congress of 1781 and 1782, to be placed in Statuary Hall, in the Capitol, at Washington, D. C.

By authority of the act of the general assembly of Maryland, the governor appointed John Lee Carroll, Douglas H. Thomas, Thomas J. Shryock, Fabian Franklin, and Richard K. Cross to constitute a commission to procure and have the statues erected.

I am informed by the commissioners that the statues were made by Mr. Richard E. Brooks, of Boston; that they are completed and have been placed in position, and are now ready to be presented to Congress.

As governor of the State of Maryland, therefore, I have the honor to present to the Government of the United States the statues of the distinguished statesmen named.

Very respectfully, JOHN WALTER SMITH,
Governor of Maryland.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following resolutions, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be presented to the State of Maryland for providing the bronze statues of Charles Carroll of Carrollton and John Hanson, citizens of Maryland, illustrious for their historic renown and distinguished civic services.

Resolved, That the statues be accepted and placed in the National Statuary Hall in the Capitol, and that a copy of these resolutions, duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Maryland.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, on the 2d day of July, 1864, the President approved an act of Congress inviting each of the States to present statues, not more than two in number, of deceased persons who had rendered such military or civic service as entitled them to commemoration as national figures in Statuary Hall in the National Capitol.

Maryland, hesitating lovingly among the multitude of her distinguished sons, Thomas Johnson, William Pinkney, William Smallwood, John Eager Howard, Samuel Chase, Otho Holland Williams, Luther Martin, Roger B. Taney, Reverdy Johnson, Henry Winter Davis, Francis Scott Key, and a score of others, has at last made her selection and has presented the two handsome bronze statues which have been added to the brilliant galaxy of statesmen and soldiers which surround the nation's Hall of Fame.

By an act of the general assembly of Maryland, approved in 1898, an appropriation was made and a commission appointed, consisting of Ex-Governor John Lee Carroll, Douglas H. Thomas, Thomas J. Shryock, Dr. Fabian Franklin, and Richard K. Cross, who were instructed to have designed and cast statues of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and John Hanson, President of the United States in Congress assembled from 1781 to 1782.

The marked ability and artistic taste with which that commission has discharged its duty are attested by the excellence of these two statues, executed in bronze by Mr. Richard E. Brooks, of Boston, Mass.

To accept this gift of the old Commonwealth of Maryland to the Government and people of the United States, are we gathered here to-day under authority of a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on the 17th day of January, 1903.

The pleasant duty devolves upon me to speak to the exalted virtues of Charles Carroll of Carrollton. To form an adequate estimate of the character of a man who has gone before us, Mr. Speaker, we must try to view him in the light of his time and to measure him by the standard then existing. To secure the true likeness, we must paint the picture on the background of his environment while living, with the side lights and full lights of his surroundings, inquire how far he followed or disregarded precedents, and learn the extent to which his course, in crises, conformed to or violated the rules and tendencies of his education and station.

When America was discovered, it was said that the new land concealed a fountain whose perpetual waters had power to reanimate age and restore the strength of youth. The tradition was true, but the youth to be renewed was the youth of society: the life to bloom afresh was the life of the race; and this was to be accomplished by the revolution of the colonies, which was the consummation of freedom's struggle for nearly two centuries. The forces working toward it had their origin in the great mental revival of the Reformation in the sixteenth century. Man, after groping through the darkness of feudalism, had at last faintly seen the light. Free inquiry, freedom of thought in spiritual affairs, was soon followed by the desire for freedom of thought and action in the temporal order. The dignity of man's individuality had been clouded by his subserviency to superior power. In the old civilization of Europe, authority and power moved from the superior to the inferior. The Government esteemed itself invested by divine right with the power to furnish protection and demand submission.

But a new principle had taken possession of the heart of man. The right to apply the powers of his mind to any question, and to assert his individual judgment began to creep upon his intelligence.

Successive ages of struggle, successive lives, and deaths of heroes in the world of thought, had brought man to the idea of the freedom of the individual, and it was then but the work of time to carry him to the comprehension of the power that lies in the collective reason of the whole—to teach him to substitute the natural equality of man for the hereditary privilege of monarchs, to replace the irresponsible authority of a sovereign with a dependent government emanating from the harmonized opinions of equal individuals.

The spark of liberty that first glimmered in the breasts of the Anglos and Saxons in the forests of Germany kept smoldering through the centuries, now fanned into a flame by the tyranny of kings, until the Magna Charta is secured, again but a dying ember under the Tudors; now flashing fitfully in the petition and declaration of rights, and again lost sight of in foreign wars, often faint, but never dead; often hidden, but always glowing in the Anglo-Saxon breast until it burst into a blaze of beauteous glory in the Declaration of Independence, and its full effulgence rested on a free and united land.

The seventeenth century found Charles the First on the throne of England; headstrong but vacillating, arbitrary but weak, tyrannical and false, this monarch was little fitted to control the English people at a time when the leaven of liberty was working in the souls of his subjects. The divine right of kings was the political doctrine of the Stuarts; the divine right of the people was the political truth of the century.

Prerogative took the field in its stubborn contest with the popular will and never left it until the Declaration of Independence rang the death knell as well to the tyranny of kings as the tyranny of Parliaments.

In 1760 George the Third ascended the throne of England, and the tyranny of the seventeenth century, which was supposed to have died with Charles the First and the deposition of James the Second, was revived. The hand on the clock of time is turned back; civilization halts in its progress. His whole policy was bent upon the subjugation of the colonies to raise revenue, as Charles the First had done. He undertook to tax the colonies without their consent, and the stamp act was passed through Parliament with scarcely a division.

Then began the great struggle for representative government against the arbitrary power of one man.

Two great waves broke in fury over Great Britain and her colonies in America. The one ancient, the power of monarchy, rolling with all the accumulated strength of centuries; the other modern, the united will of the people, agitated by the tumultuous swellings of a popular spirit, increased by the coming flood of a newer and more modern enlightenment, rolled on in its overwhelming and resistless course.

The nobility of England had forgotten the revolution of 1688 and the lessons it had taught. The King had forgotten the lesson of the death of Charles the First, and the power to tax the colonies internally without their consent in the face of the Magna Charta, the declaration of rights, the charters of the colonies, and the determined will of the people was not only asserted as a financial necessity but maintained as a political right.

This was the England to which Charles Carroll of Carrollton went in 1757, when he entered the Temple at London to study law at the age of 20, after having spent the prior period of his life from 8 years of age at St. Omers, Rheims, and Paris, in France, the home of absolute monarchy.

Such was the situation of the province of Maryland and its relation to the mother country when, in 1764, a refined and cultured aristocrat, the pampered son of a father who was the protégé of Cæcilius Calvert, and bound to the Stuarts by every tie of social contact and royal beneficence, he landed at Annapolis on the 14th of February, at the age of 27, a disfranchised citizen by reason of his faith. Charles Carroll of Carrollton was of almost royal ancestry, being descended from the princely family of the Carrolls of Ely O'Carroll, Kings County, Ireland.

He was an aristocrat by birth, breeding, education, and association. His every hereditary connection and tendency was monarchical. He did not spring from the free gentry of Great Britain, nor from the masses who, during the century of his birth, were struggling for the recognition of the inherent rights of free manhood, but from the ruling classes, who, attached to the absolute monarchy of their time, were fighting to delay, aye, to prevent, this recognition. His paternal grandfather, Charles Carroll, after his admission to the bar, became the secretary of Lord Powis, one of the ministers of James the Second, who bespoke for him the favor of Cæcilius Calvert, the first Lord Baltimore, with whose commission of attorney-general of the province he came to Maryland in 1688.

By Lord Baltimore he was endowed with large landed estates, which made him and his descendants the wealthiest residents of the province, and he was ever attached to the service of the proprietary, the grant of the King.

His father, Charles Carroll the second, if I may so call him, was also connected with the proprietary by every tie, and had that pride of ancestry characteristic of caste and class, invariably binding such men to the existing order and opposing them to changes in government.

In 1761 we find him writing to his son, Charles Carroll of Carrollton, then a student abroad, to trace back his Irish ancestry to the year 1500, in these words:

> I find by history as well as by genealogy that the country of Ely O'Carroll and Dirguill, which comprehended most of King's and Queen's counties, were the territories of the O'Carrolls, and that they were princes thereof. You may, as things are now circumstanced, and considering the low estate to which all the branches of our family are reduced by the struggles the ancient Irish maintained for the support of their religion, rights, and properties, and which received their finishing stroke at the Revolution, think my inquiry an idle one, but I do not think so. If I am not right, the folly may be excused by its being a general one, and I hope for your own and my sake you will gratify me by making as careful an inquiry as possible and giving me what light you can on the subject. As soon as there is peace I will send you the genealogy, in Irish and English, and I desire you will get our family in particular traced to its origin.

Thus descended, thus reared, thus associated, every factor of his environment should have molded the youthful mind of Charles Carroll of Carrollton in the rut of the past and ordained him as a defender of the tyranny of kings against the rights of the people.

Notwithstanding a previous effort of his father to have him sell his estates in Maryland and expatriate himself, he returned to America in 1765 a finished scholar and an accomplished gentleman and took possession of his large estates in Maryland, part of which was called "Carrollton," by which he afterwards distinguished himself from his relative, Charles Carroll, barrister, of Annapolis. With wealth to indulge every whim, with refined literary taste and ability to engage his thought, with friends to amuse him, and barred from public life and politics by his religion, there was nothing to draw him into the vortex of the controversy over human rights by which he soon found himself surrounded save the inherent sense of justice and of right which shaped his whole life. The profits of his profession offered no temptation; the emoluments of office could not allure the richest man in the province. He could hope to gain no concessions from the Provincial Government in espousing its cause; no place of prominence and power at the hands of the people for defending their rights, for both were Protestant. He was a Catholic, disqualified by reason of his faith from voting or holding office in the "Land of the Sanctuary."

The loss of his fixed and substantial wealth stood as a constant warning to him not to be active in any of the many controversies arising in this new country and age, and pointed to indifference and neutrality as the course which an enlightened selfishness should pursue.

Association, friendship, love of home and neighbor, did not combine to turn him to the cause of his countrymen, for he had spent his whole life from childhood to mature manhood in the schools of absolutism in France, and had formed his friendships among those classes in both England and France which were not only wedded to the forms and practices of tyranny, but were in many instances a part of the government which oppressed.

No man in all the colonies was more encircled by conditions that would have predisposed him to the royal cause, or at least to diplomatic inactivity, than Charles Carroll of Carrollton.

Reason, experience, and indeed posterity would have condoned such a course, and nothing but an enlightened mind, a loyal and a brave heart, could have so completely divorced him from all the precedents of his life. The ordinary man is largely the creature of circumstances. He usually follows the crowd.

To accept the conditions in which a man finds himself, to agree with his neighbor, make no great draft on either moral or physical courage. To break the bond of one's surroundings, to sever old friendships and associations, to disagree with one's neighbor, aye, to fight and kill him, to risk life, property, all, in crisises which involve all, demands that lofty moral courage, that intelligent self-containment, that complete unselfishness, that has in all ages distinguished the great man from the small.

What did this young Irishman find when in 1764, at 27 years of age, he set foot upon the soil of Maryland and took possession of his large estate? He found a fair land, dedicated to religious freedom, welcoming him as a citizen, but for his faith depriving him of a citizen's dearest rights; a province whose royal charter guaranteed its citizens all the ancient rights of Englishmen and protected them, in terms, from taxation by any but their own representative; a colony sacred to man's most modern rights trembling with the prospect of the stamp act, finally imposed on the 22d day of March, 1765.

He found the proprietary government, the government of which his fathers had been a part, the government of the benefactors of his family, bent upon imposing taxes upon the people in the shape of fees of public officers and tithes to the Episcopal clergy by proclamation of the governor, without the consent of the people through their representatives. The stamp act would have cost him but little, the fees to public officers and tithes to the clergy would not have embarrassed him seriously, in his great wealth. He could have paid them, but in each of these controversies he saw a principle embodied, the sacred principle that the people alone have the right to tax themselves. He saw that this question must be settled then, there, for him, for his fellow-citizens, for humanity, for posterity.

No hesitation marked his course. Throwing aside every association of his early life, risking his vast property, manfully overcoming every predilection arising from his ancestry, birth, and education, he cast his lot with the people. No public act or utterance marks his attitude toward this historic piece of tyranny, for he could not vote or hold office; but that his heart was the patriot's heart appears in a letter to his friend Edmund Jennings, of London, in which he says:

> Should the stamp act be enforced by tyrannical soldiery, our property, our liberty, our very existence is at an end. And you may be persuaded that nothing but an armed force can execute this worst of laws. Can England, surrounded with powerful enemies, distracted with intestine factions, encumbered and almost staggering under the immense load of debt, little short of £150,000,000, send out such a powerful army to deprive their fellow-subjects of their rights and liberties?
> If ministerial influence and parliamentary corruption should not blush at such a detestable scheme; if Parliament, blind to their own interest and forgetting that they are the guardians of sacred liberty and of our happy constitution, should have the impudence to avow this open infraction of both, will England, her commerce annihilated by the oppression of America, be able to maintain these troops? Reflect on the immense ocean that divides this fruitful country from the island whose power, as its territory is circumscribed, has already arrived at its zenith, while the power of this continent is growing daily and in time will be as unbounded as our dominions are extensive. The rapid increase in manufactures surpasses the expectation of the most sanguine American. Even the arts and sciences commence to flourish, and in these, as in arms, the day, I hope, will come when America will be superior to all the world.

Prophetic hope, uttered at the dawn of the nation's darkest day, resplendently realized at the dawn of a new century, on a day when we commemorate the virtues of the patriot whom it inspired!

In his opposition to the next step of government, to assume the rights of the people Charles Carroll left his retirement and stepped into public gaze as the avowed champion of the people. Public officers in Maryland had always been paid by fees fixed by the assembly. The law fixing those fees and the tithes which the Episcopal clergy of the Established Church were allowed to collect had expired by its own limitation. The house of burgesses and the council failed to agree on a new law, and Governor Eden prorogued the assembly and by executive proclamation fixed the fees and tithes himself.

This action of the governor aroused more indignation in the province, if possible, than the stamp act, which was soon repealed. In his opposition to this proclamation he perhaps shone brightest in all his long advocacy of the people's rights against the aggressions of arbitrary power.

In a series of published letters, replete with erudition, in classic style and poignant satire, Charles Carroll again espoused the people's cause, and, on the broad ground that these fees and tithes were nothing short of taxes on the people, and as such could only be imposed upon them by their consent, through their duly elected representatives, he arraigned the governor and his secretary of state, the gifted Daniel Dulaney, in dialogues between the First and Second Citizen, and which were the philippics of the age.

During this written debate he was taunted as "Jesuit," "anti-Christ," a "man without a country;" and yet his devotion to the people's cause rose supreme over every insult, over all injustice, and inspired him with an eloquence of diction and a forcefulness of statement which put to rout the great Daniel Dulany, the peer of any lawyer of his time in England or America.

The broad liberality of his mind and soul, his devotion to civil and religious freedom, appear in this controversy, when in referring to the English Revolution he says:

> That the national religion was in danger under James the Second from his bigotry and despotic temper, the dispensing power assumed by him and every other part of his conduct clearly evince. The nation had a right to resist and so secure its civil and religious liberties. I am as averse to having a religion crammed down people's throats as a proclamation.

This was the reply of a Catholic in a time of intense feeling between religious sects, which had gone to the length of bloody wars, in a controversy in which the deprivation of his rights by reason of his religion furnished the taunt to this adversary, and characterizes a mind as broad and a soul as lofty as the spirit of religious toleration in which Maryland alone of all the colonies first reared an altar.

Meanwhile events hurried on in rapid succession. England bent upon the subjugation of the colonies, deprived them of one ancient right after another—the duty on tea, the Boston port bill, the appointment of the judiciary by the Crown, the navigation acts, were all laid with ruthless hand upon the weak but determined colonists. The people remonstrated, petitioned, prayed. At last when petition availed not, when remonstrance seemed vain, when patience had ceased to be a virtue, and moderation had failed, the people of the colonies, characterized as well by their loyalty and obedience, as by their love of law and hatred of tyranny, rebelled against the systematic oppressions of George the Third.

The immortal Otis inspired Massachusetts by his magnificent patriotism and proposed a congress of the colonies. "Join or die" echoed from the green hills of New Hampshire to the shores of the Savannah. Virginia, under Patrick Henry, South Carolina, under Christopher Gadsen, and Maryland, with a spontaneous outburst of patriotism led by Charles Carroll and Thomas Johnson, approved the suggestion, and each of the colonies, catching up the music of union, joined with heavenly harmony in the glorious anthem of a new nation. In all this struggle the province of Maryland was foremost, most unselfish.

To prove this must we be reminded that the Frederick County court first had the courage, eleven years before the Declaration of Independence, to declare the stamp act unconstitutional; that before a hostile foot had pressed her soil the sons of Maryland flew to arms at the trumpet call of Massachusetts oppressions, not to defend their own homes, not to protect their own families, but to assist a sister colony in maintaining with their blood the principles of free government?

Must we again be told that the old Maryland Line was first to drive the serried ranks of England from the heights of Harlem at the point of the bayonet, and that they bore the brunt of almost every fight thenceforth to Valley Forge? Must the generous haste with which her sons responded to the call of the conquered Carolinas be recounted, and how, from Camden to Eutaw Springs, through Guilford Court-House, Hobkirks Hill, and Cowpens, with a determined courage born of patriotic conviction, with an impetuous valor inspired by its responsibility to the future of mankind, the Maryland Line, the tenth legion of Green's army, the old guard of the Continental forces, dashed with Morgan through the veterans of the daring Tarleton and with Howard through the Irish Buffs of the gallant Webster, and drove them, at the point of the bayonet, in panic from the field?

No hated stamp ever polluted the soil of Maryland. Her citizens in daylight, not disguised as Indians, met the ship The Good Intent, laden with dutiable articles, at the harbor of Annapolis four years before the destruction of the tea in Boston Harbor, of which our infant lips are taught to prattle, and compelled her to put back to England with her unwelcome cargo, and within six months after the destruction of the tea at Boston Harbor, assembled without disguise and compelled the owner of the Peggy Stewart, with a cargo of tea, to set fire to and burn her to the water's edge.

Out of a population of about 250,000 souls she furnished to the Continental Armies 5,000 militia and 15,000 regulars, 400 of whom, at the battle of Long Island, withstood six attacks of a full brigade of English veterans, covered the retreat of the Continental Army, saved it from destruction and the Revolution from collapse, leaving 260 of their number on the field.

Mr. Speaker, in paying tribute to one of Maryland's greatest sons I may be pardoned for this partial digression, which so naturally thrusts itself upon one's attention in reviewing the history of the time written by Northern men, who by some inadvertence seem to have overlooked the leading part the colony played in the war for human rights. In all of this, of all of this, was Charles Carroll of Carrollton, not as a soldier, but as an organizer and maturer of provisional and permanent government in the province and the nation.

While I am aware, sir, that military deeds and fame are more dazzling and lasting in men's minds than the less dramatic life of a civil officer during war, yet it is apparent that as great ability, heroism, and patriotism is needed and may be displayed in civil office in such crises as on the tented field. The army is the executive arm of a people in such a time, while behind the glamour, the martial pomp and glory of all successful wars lies the patient, painstaking, plodding statesman, reconciling differences, quieting passion, abating jealousies, re-forming government out of the broken pieces of a former structure, recruiting armies, providing financial system, guarding foreign relations, and raising revenue, without all of which wars are impossible and their results fruitless of good to the people.

Charles Carroll of Carrollton chose the less showy part. He formulated policy, inspired patriotism, collected troops and provided for their maintenance, guided public sentiment toward liberty, yet retained it short of license, embodied into laws rules of action for the people to fit the time, meet their aspirations, and safeguard the liberties which they won by blood and battle, not only from foreign but domestic attack.

The convention of Maryland assembled July 26, 1775, and at once adopted resolutions throwing off the proprietary power and assuming a provisional government. This convention issued its declaration of independence, known as the "Association of the Freemen of Maryland," in which they approved the resistance of British aggression by force, pledged themselves to sustain this opposition, and gave as their principal reason for such a course not their own wrongs, but the oppression of the province of Massachusetts Bay by the British. Carroll was a member of this convention and a signer of the articles of the association.

This association vested all the power of government in a provincial convention, and Carroll became a member of this convention. The executive power of the new government was conferred by this convention upon a committee of safety, consisting of sixteen members, and Carroll became a member of this committee, which had full charge of military and naval affairs. The glorious record of Maryland troops, which I have just faintly and partially reviewed, therefore was attributable in a large measure to his care and executive ability.

As a member of this committee and of the committee of observation of his county, as a commissioner with Samuel Chase, of Maryland, and Dr. Franklin to Canada to persuade her to join the colonies, as a member of Congress, as a member of the board of war and the committee on foreign applications, as a member of the senate of Maryland and of the United States Senate for many years, he did industrious, laborious, and distinguished service in conducting the war to a successful conclusion, securing the independence of the colonies and reorganizing society in the province and nation into well-regulated governments.

To follow him through the various public functions he performed would be to write the civic history of the State and nation during their struggles, and I shall but revert to some of his most distinguished services to both as a constructive statesman.

To him perhaps more than to any other single man was due the honor for securing official action by the colony in favor of casting her lot with her sister colonies. The people of the province met in convention on May 8, 1776, to select delegates to Congress, which was to decide whether the colonies should declare their independence, and agreed in this convention by resolution that the interests of the colonies would be best subserved by a reunion with Great Britain. Charles Carroll was absent, but at a subsequent session, June 21, he was present, and, prevailing upon the delegates to reverse their former action, prepared and succeeded in having adopted a resolution instructing Maryland's delegates in Congress "to join her sister colonies in declaring the united colonies free and independent States," with the proviso (which showed his zealous care of the autonomy of the State), that "the sole and exclusive right of regulating the internal government of the colony be reserved to the people thereof."

The recent tendency to elect Senators by the popular vote gives peculiar interest to the fact that Charles Carroll of Carrollton, as a member of the first constitutional convention of Maryland, was the author of the method of electing the Senators of that State by electors chosen by the people and not by the people directly. This method, which obtained in Maryland until 1837, six years after his death, differed from that of every other colony that had up to that time framed a constitution, made the Maryland senate a famous body for many years, and furnished the model for the method afterwards prescribed in the Constitution of the United States for electing Senators thereof. It had the approval of Madison, Taney, and many others, and in the formative period of the State's early history secured the best ability of the State for the Senate and saved the people much hasty, ill-digested, and reckless legislation.

The necessity of perfect freedom of commerce between the States and the absence of any provision for it in the articles of confederation had perhaps as much to do with the framing of the Constitution of the United States, which made this country "one and inseparable, now and forever," as any other one thing. This necessity created the interstate-commerce clause in the Constitution, the shortest and perhaps the most benign and comprehensive provision in that great instrument; the clause through which alone it is conceded effective legislation may be enacted to regulate and control the so-called trusts. It is not, I apprehend, generally known that this necessity was first and most prominently developed in a controversy between Virginia and Maryland, which became acute in 1777. Virginia claimed the right to collect tolls on all vessels going through the capes into Chesapeake Bay, which right, if conceded, placed the trade of Maryland's principal port at the mercy of the State of Virginia.

Maryland resisted it, and in this year the two houses of the legislature appointed commissioners to meet those from Virginia to settle the jurisdiction of the rivers and the bay dividing the two States. Charles Carroll, Thomas Stone, and Brice Thomas Beale Worthington were selected with others from the house to prepare instructions for the guidance of the Maryland commissioners. This dispute convinced the States that all navigable interstate waters as well as all other means of interstate commerce must be within the regulation of a central and superior government, which was afterwards accomplished by the interstate-commerce clause.

Credit may be fairly claimed for Maryland, through Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, and her other representatives, for the promotion and accomplishment of another great national benefit, which has redounded richly to the welfare of the people—the surrender by the States to the General Government of all their western lands, which afterwards comprised the great Northwest Territory. Maryland first brought this matter to the attention of Congress, and persisted in her demand by refusing to sign the articles of confederation until this concession was made.

Maryland had been twice shorn of her territory, once by Pennsylvania and again by Virginia, and she was unwilling that these immense and unknown tracts, extending, as was thought in that day, to the Southern Sea, and subjugated by the blood of all the colonists, should be the sole estate of the several States which claimed them by vague titles.

This vast expanse, since divided into States and furnishing homes for thousands of prosperous American citizens, teeming with industry and rich in possessions of all kinds, owes in a large measure its present condition to the attitude of Maryland and the statesmanship of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, and the nation finds a better balance in the territorial area of its States.

Charles Carroll did not remain long in Congress, and, indeed, his career there does not seem to have been as brilliant in the two terms he served as his service in the State senate was. He resigned, after having been elected the third time, because, as he said:

> The great deal of time which was idly wasted in frivolous debates disgusted me so much that I thought I might spend mine better than by remaining a silent hearer of such speeches as neither edified, entertained, or instructed me.

Comment upon the wisdom of his reason is, perhaps, unnecessary here.

Elected to the first Senate of the United States under the Articles of Confederation, still holding his seat in the Maryland senate, he was an active and influential—nay, a leading figure in both. The roll of almost every important committee in the Maryland senate during his long service there, and that of almost every committee of importance in the Senate of the United States, until he resigned therefrom to avoid losing his seat in the senate of his State, contains the name of Charles Carroll of Carrollton.

His legislative career, sir, seems to have been distinguished rather by real, unattractive, effective work in preparing bills, reports, and public papers than in the discussion of questions on the floor. Scarcely a communication passed between the two houses of the Maryland assembly during his service in its senate that he did not prepare and present that communication. Fearless independence characterized his attitude toward and vote upon public questions in both the Maryland legislature and in both Houses of Congress. The records of both contain many votes on which he stood alone, or nearly so. If he were alone it was the loneliness of righteousness—his solitude was the solitude of conscientious conviction. Secure in the confidence of his own rectitude, he did not fear to stand alone, but always, whether in reports or debate, gave reasons for his positions that inspired the confidence of his associates in his integrity and intelligence.

Devoted to human freedom, although a large owner of slaves, he introduced a bill into the United States Senate for the gradual abolishment of slavery. Honest in every instinct, he resolutely and invariably resisted the issuance by State or Nation of a depreciated or depreciating paper currency, and maintained his position by some of the strongest papers ever written upon that subject.

His fertile mind grasped with equal ease all public subjects, from the bestowal of titles on public officers in the United States, which he opposed, to intricate questions of revenue, finance, and diplomacy.

His skillful management of Maryland's fight for the national capital, which resulted in its location on Maryland soil on the banks of the Potomac, stamped him as an astute leader of men and conspires with many other evidences of his greatness to make the erection of a statue to him on this spot most fitting.

Nor was great capacity for public affairs the only talent of this many-sided man. There are few great business enterprises of his time and section with the promotion and active management of which his name is not connected. As one of the incorporators of and a stockholder in the Baltimore Iron Works, as an incorporator of the company then known as "The Proprietors of the Susquehanna Canal" (to make that river navigable from the border of Maryland to tidewater), as one of the commissioners of the State of Maryland to confer with those of Virginia for the opening and extension of navigation on the Potomac, which resulted in the renewal of the Potomac Company, the parent of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, and, finally, as the first of the American directors of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, he proved that his capabilities were not confined to abstract discussion of theories of government, but extended to the successful advancement of the material interests of the State.

Tall, straight, slender, graceful, and imposing in figure and mien, polished and courtly in manner and address, refined and cultivated in mind and spirit, pure of purpose and of lofty ideals and aspirations, he was the paragon of the gentleman, the patriot, and the statesman of his time.

Leading by ability, not pretense; persuading by reason, not sophistry; commanding by affection, not fear, he was a distinct and effective factor in all the great work of his generation until, with honors thick upon him and the consciousness of work well done, he retired from public life with the love of those who knew him best, the lofty esteem of those with whom he served his country, and the confidence, respect, and gratitude of all his fellow-citizens, and died lamented by every man who cherished honor and loved virtue.

In the heart of the older Maryland, where he located the capital of the United States, at the left hand of the great Samuel Adams, who fired the citizenship of Massachusetts, as he that of Maryland, into open resistance to oppression, looking toward Allen and Garfield, of Ohio, formed from the trackless Northwest, which he saved to the nation for the constructing of free States, and in company with Benton and Blair, of Missouri, who in a later crisis led their State to adhere to the Union, as he, in the first great crisis, led his to adhere to her sister colonies to throw off the tyranny of England, he, and they, and all their associates will stand as silent and continual monuments to the immortal truth they labored and fought to establish, that the collective will of individual freemen is the truth and only source of the power and authority of all the governments of man. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, nearly forty years ago the President of the United States was authorized by law to extend an invitation to each State of the Union to contribute to the Chamber of the old House of Representatives, now known as Statuary Hall, the figures in imperishable marble or bronze of not exceeding two of her deceased citizens, illustrious for their historic renown or for distinguished civil or military service such as might be deemed worthy of national commemoration.

It is matter of historic interest that the author of the proposition was that distinguished son of Vermont to whom the people of this country in largest part owe their splendid Congressional Library and who for a period of more than forty years in the House of Representatives and in the Senate rendered to his country illustrious public service, the late Senator Justin Morrill.

What he said in speaking to the passage of the bill in the House on April 19, 1864, is worthy of reproduction here at this time. With reference to the Hall of the old House he said:

> Congress is the guardian of this fine old Hall, surpassing in beauty all the rooms of this vast pile, and should protect it from desecration. Its noble columns from a quarry exhausted and incapable of reproduction—
> "Nature formed but one,
> And broke the die in molding."
> Its democratic simplicity and grandeur of style and its wealth of association, with many earnest and eloquent chapters in the history of our country, deserve perpetuity at the hands of an American Congress. It was here that many of our most distinguished men, whose fame "the world will not willingly let die," began or ended their career.
> It appears to me eminently proper, therefore, that this House should take the initiative in setting apart with reverent affection the Hall, so charged with precious memories, to some purpose of usefulness and dignity. To what end more useful or grand, and at the same time simple and inexpensive, can we devote it than to ordain that it shall be set apart for the reception of such statuary as each State shall elect to be deserving of this lasting commemoration? Will not all the States with generous emulation proudly respond, and thus furnish a new evidence that the Union will clasp and hold forever all its jewels—the glories of the past, civil, military, and judicial—in one hallowed spot where those who will be here to aid in carrying on the Government may daily receive fresh inspiration and new incentives.
> "To scorn delights and live laborious days?" and where pilgrims from all parts of the Union, as well as from foreign lands, may come and behold a gallery filled with such American manhood as succeeding generations will delight to honor, and see also the actual form and mold of those who have inerasably fixed their names on the pages of history.

Whether the conception was original with Mr. Morrill or not, I do not know. It may be that it had been his fortune to visit St. Stephen's Hall in the new palace of Westminster and to behold on either hand "the statues of Parliamentary statesmen who rose to eminence by the eloquence and abilities they displayed in the House of Commons;" of Hampden, the apostle of liberty, in an age of royal arrogance; of Falkland, Clarendon, Selden, Somers, and Mansfield, immortal in the annals of English law; of Sir Robert Walpole, Fox, Burk, and Grattan, unsurpassed in the logical and thrilling eloquence of English speech; of the Earl of Chatham, America's friend in her time of need, and of his brilliant son, incomparable statesman even in his early manhood, and, equally with his father, dear to us in his devotion to our cause, William Pitt.

It may be that, thrilled with the emotions of his sight, he contemplated an array of American statesmen, orators, and public men who in our American capital should challenge comparison with this array of the mother country in her historic hall. However that may be, it is nevertheless true that while "the actual form and mold of Justin Morrill, who has inerasably fixed his name on the pages of our history, does not appear in our Hall of Statues, it is also true that column and arch and the artistic whole bear testimony to his memory and are suggestive of his patriotic foresight.

Maryland to-day asserts her right to a place in the gallery of our heroes and presents to the nation the statues of two of her citizens illustrious for their historic renown, distinguished for civic service, and worthy of national commemoration, and prays judgment upon her choice.

In this ceremony Pennsylvania is no intruder. She claims a right to a part in the imposing exercises. William Penn and George Calvert (Lord Baltimore) were twin pioneers in an adventure upon a new continent. Quaker and Roman Catholic, they each sought a virgin soil on which to plant and nourish the principles of civil and religious liberty. Knight-errants were they in the search for that of which England in her decadence under the rule of the Stuarts knew nothing. But more than that, Pennsylvania and Maryland have an intimate place in history, because of the fact that the royal grants to Penn and Calvert gave rise to a question of title that has a marked place in our national history. Parts of the same territory were included in each royal concession. Hence arose a controversy which was ultimately determined by the definition of Mason and Dixon's line—a line which for years was looked upon not only as dividing territory, but as the boundary between human liberty and the system of human slavery. Such line of demarcation, thank God, is now a thing of the forgotten and buried past. Pennsylvania and Maryland are now as they were in the beginning twin champions of the institutions which mean liberty to all men, and but recently the valor of their sons fighting in a common cause testifies their common interest in humanity, even to the shedding of blood on foreign soils. Theirs a common flag and a common creed of freedom.

Maryland asks the nation to accept as her contribution to its gallery of heroes John Hanson and Charles Carroll of Carrollton. John Hanson was a distinguished patriot of the times that tried men's souls, and fills a large place in the Maryland history of those times. Others will speak at length of his virtues and his title to our regard. I prefer to speak of that other distinguished man whose statue in bronze we face to-day in the company of the immortals whom the various States of this Union have set up with pride in our Capitol—Charles Carroll of Carrollton. As much as any man of his generation anywhere, and more than any other man of his generation in Maryland—and there were giants in those days—he stands for that generation's grand conception and heroic acts.

Born in 1737, he long outlived the contemporaries of his birth. Dying in 1832, at the age of 95 years, he is conspicuously known as the last survivor of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. But that is by no means his only title to an honorable fame. His life's history is unique. Thirty years he was a student, preparatory to a life of patriotic action equally long, and that was followed by another like period of rest and scholarly recreation in the practice of the virtues of citizenship which furnished to his contemporaries and to posterity an illustrious example for their guide and instruction. This triple career has no parallel in American history or, so far as I know, in any other. His first thirty years were spent partly in a home school, but mainly abroad in institutions of learning on the Continent, in a study of languages, of the arts, of philosophy, of all that conspires to make the accomplished and scholarly gentleman. He was a student of the civil law in France and of the common law in England.

Endowed by inheritance with great wealth he might have surrendered himself to the enjoyment of ease and the comforts of life, without regard to the great questions that the period in which he lived presented. His life covered the period preceding the Revolution, the Revolutionary period, and that which succeeded it. In each and all of these he was a prominent and commanding figure. He was during his whole life conspicuously Maryland's champion of the cause of civil and religious liberty.

His sojourn and education abroad had no influence upon his Americanism. He returned to his home in Maryland an ardent patriot, imbued with the spirit of independence and prepared to give his life, his energies, and his talents to its service. He returned at a time when the storm clouds were already gathering that presaged the Revolution, and he enrolled himself actively upon the side of the colonies and against the mother country. His scholarly and energetic pen was devoted to the task of creating and encouraging a patriotic and aggressive public opinion.

At one time a question arose in the house of delegates relative to the fees of civil officers of the colonial government. This the governor undertook to settle by a proclamation, and a question as to his right to do so became the subject of discussion in the public press. In a series of letters notable for their classic style, their convincing logic, and the spirit of freedom that pervaded them, under the nom de plume of First Citizen, Mr. Carroll assailed the governor's right. "In a land of freedom," said he, "this arbitrary exertion of the prerogative will not, must not, be endured." Although opposed by Mr. Daniel Dulaney, the provincial secretary, a man of great power as a writer and distinguished reputation as a lawyer, Mr. Carroll succeeded in securing the indorsement of public opinion, and the governor's proclamation was burnt by the common hangman. He early foresaw that the continued encroachment of England upon the rights of the colonies must inevitably result in war.

When Mr. Graves, a member of Parliament, asserted that 6,000 soldiers would easily march from one end of the colonies to the other, he replied:

So they may, but they will be masters of the spot only on which they encamp. They will find naught but enemies before and around them. If we are beaten in the plains we will retreat to our mountains and defy them. Our resources will increase with our difficulties. Necessity will force us to exertion, until, tired of combating in vain against a spirit which victory after victory can not subdue, your armies will evacuate our soil, and your country retire a great loser by the contest.

In June, 1774, the delegates of Maryland as a protest against British aggression declared the importation of tea to be unlawful. A certain Mr. Stewart, a friend of Mr. Carroll's, was a consignee of a cargo of the forbidden merchandise in his brig Peggy Stewart.

Indignant people rose up to prevent the unloading. Mr. Carroll was appealed to by the owner for protection. Setting aside, however, his personal esteem for his friend, he declared the importation to be in defiance of the law, and said "My advice is that he (the owner) set fire to the vessel and burn her, together with the tea that she contains, to the water's edge," and this was done. In the Revolutionary period Charles Carroll of Carrollton filled many conspicuous and important as well as laborious offices in which his services proved of great advantage to the cause of the struggling colonists. He was a member of the first committee of observation in Maryland and a delegate in the provincial convention.

That convention at one time instructed the Maryland Representative in the General Congress "To disavow in the most solemn manner all design in the colonies of independence."

He secured a repeal of these instructions and a substitution in their stead of a direction to the Representatives "To concur with the other united colonies, or a majority of them, in declaring the united colonies free and independent States."

He was one of the three commissioners—Samuel Chase and Dr. Franklin being the others—appointed to effect if possible a coalition between Canada and the colonies against the mother country.

Had the attempt, which failed, been successful and had Canada joined forces in the cause of independence, how different might now have been the complexion of the American Union! He was a member of the Congress that gave to the world the Declaration of Independence and one of the signers of that great instrument. He was a member of the board of war and continued while on that board and in Congress to be a member also of the Maryland convention. He was one of the committee appointed to draft the constitution of his State. After the adoption of the constitution, he was twice United States Senator from the State of Maryland. He was one of the commissioners for settling the boundary line between Maryland and Virginia.

I do not regard this as a proper occasion on which to attempt a lengthy or detailed review of the life of Charles Carroll of Carrollton. What I have said is sufficient to indicate that in the choice of his statue for Statuary Hall Maryland has complied with the strict letter of the law and contributed one of her citizens illustrious for historic renown and distinguished for civil service worthy of national commemoration.

Charles Carroll was an ardent Federalist, and with the downfall of that party in 1801 laid down the burdens of public and retired to private life. He was then 64 years of age. There yet remained to him, as the sequel showed, thirty-two years more of life, all of which were spent in the enjoyment of a dignified leisure, in scholarly pursuits, and in the practice of his religion, to which he was ardently devoted. He was an enthusiastic Roman Catholic, faithful to the teachings of his church and observant of its customs and obligations.

A scholar, a statesman, a man of affairs, a Christian gentleman, he was idolized by his fellow-citizens, not only for what he had done, but for what he was in himself and by way of example to others.

Since I came into this Hall this afternoon I find that so honored and conspicuous a figure was Charles Carroll in his old age that he received express recognition from Congress. I find the following letter, written to him by Andrew Stevenson, the Speaker of the House:

WASHINGTON, May 22, 1828.

SIR: I have the honor to communicate to you, by direction of the House of Representatives, the inclosed joint resolution of both Houses of Congress, extending to you, as the only surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence, the privilege of franking. You will be pleased, sir, to receive it as a token of the distinguished respect and veneration which Congress entertains toward an early and devoted friend to liberty, and one who stood preeminently forward in the purest and noblest band of patriots that this world has ever seen.

I can not resist the gratification which this opportunity affords of publicly testifying the strong sentiments of esteem and veneration which, individually, I entertain for your character and services, and expressing an earnest hope that the evening of your long life may be as peaceful and happy as it has been active and useful.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

ANDREW STEVENSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

It was his happy lot to see the Government that he had helped to found grow in strength and influence; to see his country expand in territory and wealth, and to be inspired with the faith that the future held in store for it only continued and progressive advances.

Charles Carroll of Carrollton's title to enduring fame rests upon the fact that he was a lover of and a successful worker in the cause of human liberty.

A great American orator once said, in speaking about statues:

The honors we grant mark how high we stand, and they educate the future. The men we honor and the maxims we lay down in measuring our favorites show the level and morals of the time.

Mr. Speaker, we may safely abide admeasurement by this standard when we introduce into our American Pantheon Charles Carroll of Carrollton.

Could some miracle for the time being breathe the breath of life into the figures that adorn our Statuary Hall, Carroll would need no introduction to that company, nor would that company need introduction to him. The one touch of nature that makes the whole world kin would be found in the common love of liberty, in the common devotion to its principles, and in the common life service in its cause. It would be a goodly company, in which there could be no rivalry as between its members, except rivalry as to extreme devotion to country and to fellow-man; a company that includes soldiers and statesmen, diplomats, and men who have been potent factors in the advancement of civilization; such a soldier as the chivalric and knightly Kearny; such a diplomat as Livingston, who gave to us our empire west of the Mississippi; such an agent of civilization as Robert Fulton, creator of commerce; such a statesman as Webster, expounder of the Constitution; and, peerless in the world's history among the champions of liberty, the immortal Washington. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SCHIRM. Mr. Speaker, to commemorate her great men and to perpetuate the glory of their deeds by public ceremonies and in lasting works of art are the fitting acts of a great nation.

They inspire veneration for the past and infuse hope for the future. Love of country is thereby stimulated in the bosoms of both young and old, and the spirit of sacrifice wins the devotion of the heart for future crises. A country without monuments is a living death—she throws no beam of light upon the untrodden path of the future. To her humanity looks in vain for a guiding star, but a country that molds in bronze and stone her tributes to greatness ever lives, and tells the story of her achievements to the recurring centuries with charming eloquence. Sensible of these facts, the law of our land has provided that each State might send the effigies of two of her chosen sons to be placed permanently in the National Statuary Hall.

It pleases the fancy to reflect that in that hall the House of Representatives held its meetings until the completion of this magnificent Chamber, and the imagination, Pygmalion-like, conjures into living form the statues of those patriots who, by their oratory in the forum of the House or by their heroism upon the fields of battle, won laurels for themselves and shed luster upon the pages of American history.

The State of Maryland has now availed itself of its privilege and erected among those silent witnesses of great events and the doers of great deeds the effigies of two of her illustrious sons, Charles Carroll of Carrollton and John Hanson.

My worthy and eloquent colleague has already portrayed the character and achievements of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, and the pleasant duty has been assigned me of performing a similar office in honor of John Hanson.

The little colony of Maryland played an important part in the gigantic drama which closed with the independence of the United States; and it is from this period that Maryland has made both of her selections. So many able and brilliant men have graced the history of our State that much embarrassment was encountered in choosing but two upon whom to confer this distinction, for fear that thereby injustice might seem to have been intentionally done to others. Had we been privileged we could easily have filled all available space with effigies of renowned Marylanders and yet have felt dissatisfied that others equally worthy could not be added.

Among jurists the name of Roger B. Taney, Chief Justice of the Supreme Bench of the United States, suggests itself; among statesmen, Samuel Chase; among orators, William Pinkney and Henry Winter Davis; among soldiers, Col. John Eager Howard, who with the Maryland Line saved the day at Cowpens, Gen. Otho H Williams, whose genius was displayed on many fields, and Lieut. Col. Tench Tilghman, who was an aid on the staff of General Washington; as a promoter of religious freedom, Cæcilius Calvert; as a writer of national anthems, Francis Scott Key, who gave to our country the Star Spangled Banner when he saw by the dawn's early light that our flag was still floating over the ramparts of Fort McHenry.

To John Hanson, however, belongs the distinction of having held the highest Federal office ever conferred upon a Marylander, that of President of the United States in Congress assembled, and of having done more than any other one man in the colony to destroy the supremacy of Great Britain. John Hanson was born at Mulberry Grove, Charles County, Md., on April 3, 1721. The Hanson family was a large one, and many of them found their way into the public service. His grandfather, Colonel Hanson, fell at Lützen for the cause of religious liberty; his oldest brother, Judge Walter Hanson, was commissary for Charles County; his brother Samuel was a patriot, and presented to General Washington £800 sterling to provide shoes for his barefoot soldiers; William, his youngest brother, was examiner-general of Maryland; his son, Alexander Contee, was a patriot and intimate with Washington. He was one of the first judges of the general court and chancellor of the State; he was an elector for Washington, and compiled the laws of Maryland; his son, Samuel, was a surgeon in the Life Guards of Washington, and his son, Peter Contee, of the Maryland Line, was wounded at Fort Washington.

The first mention of John Hanson in public life is as a delegate from Charles County to the lower house of assembly, in which he served nine terms. The disputes which arose between the two houses of assembly upon the burning questions of the day brought to the lower house, composed of the representatives of the people in the province, the ablest men in Maryland. He carried to that body a matured mind, which was there trained for the higher and more important responsibilities that awaited him in a broader field. At the close of the French and Indian war the tide of immigration turned to the fertile regions of Frederick County, and thither, in 1773, John Hanson followed the long train of sturdy home builders. In his new environment his personal magnetism was soon felt; his sound judgment and honesty of character won for him the respect and confidence of the people. His advice was eagerly sought in those times of growing dissatisfaction, and, through his efforts, the citizens of Frederick County became devoted to the principles of the Revolution and firm in their resistance to the oppressions of the mother country.

His influence constantly increased and he was the leading spirit among a band of determined patriots during the transition of Maryland from a dependent, proprietary province into a sovereign State. During this period of transition there gradually grew up side by side with the proprietary government another government—a government of the people. The latter was an outgrowth of the restless desire for freedom, and its formidable character was not suspected until it became too powerful to be checked. This new government consisted of a general convention of the province and its council of safety, while in the counties there were mass meetings and committees of observation, with an embryo department of state called a committee of correspondence. Hanson was a member of the convention and served as chairman of both the committee of observation and the committee of correspondence in Frederick County. To these honors was added that of treasurer of the county, and to him were intrusted all the funds to pay the soldiers and the delegates to Congress.

John Hanson was a silent, but no less effective, power. His activity was of that character as to require secrecy to make his plans effective. When, however, the crisis had been reached, when bold and fearless words were needed to arouse the resolution and strengthen the purpose of his compatriots, he arose in the convention in July, 1775, and with the unflinching determination of Patrick Henry declared that they would "repel force by force," and pledged himself to support the "present opposition." These were timely words. Enthusiasm was rekindled; other colonies heard them and rejoiced. From that day the colonists in Maryland were bound in closer union. Upon John Hanson primarily devolved the task of organizing and equipping the army. Money was scarce, arms and ammunition were scarcer, but his resourceful mind knew no obstacles.

Under his direction two companies of riflemen were sent to join the army at Boston, and these were the first troops that came from the South to Washington's assistance. Forty companies of minutemen were organized, and the whole of Maryland was put upon the defensive. Arms were manufactured, powdermills erected, and money provided through voluntary contributions. So thorough was his work that when 13,800 militia were required to reinforce the army, Maryland furnished much more than her full quota. That he had the confidence of the Government is evidenced from the fact that President Hancock made him one of a committee of two to transmit $300,000 to General Washington for the maintenance of the army in Canada, and by the further fact that he was one of the committee of four deputized to reorganize the Maryland troops, for which purpose Congress furnished the committee with blank commissions to be issued under the advice of General Washington, to officers who reenlisted after the term of their enlistment had expired.

John Hanson rendered one service to his country that can not be too greatly extolled. Lord Dunmore, the proprietary governor of Virginia, conceived the plan of arming the Indians on the frontier and to make a simultaneous attack upon the colonies from the back country and from the coast. It was planned first to fall upon Fort Pitt, in Pennsylvania, and thence to work their way eastward to Alexandria, Va., in which vicinity there was a fleet of 90 British ships prepared to continue the onslaught along the waterways. The designs of Lord Dunmore were soon detected by Hanson and by his vigilance frustrated. Dr. John Connolly, one of the chief conspirators, who had been carrying dispatches from General Gage to Lord Dunmore, and who had been operating with the Cherokee, Swanee, Mingo, and Delaware tribes, with several of his comrades, fell into the hands of the minute men of Maryland, near Hagerstown, while they were on their way to Detroit. The arrest of these allies of the King and Parliament, of General Gage and Lord Dunmore, was followed by their imprisonment, and the conspiracy died.

About four years later, in 1779, in another sphere of action, John Hanson again proved himself the man of the hour.

Maryland had persistently refused to agree to the Articles of Confederation until some provision had been made for settling the question of the Western domain. That Maryland was right in her contention subsequent events have established; but a crisis had been reached upon which may have devolved the very existence of the Union. John Hanson, believing that the failure to effect a union would probably mean the loss of everything that had been achieved and that through union alone the perplexing questions could be solved, set to work to have the bar to a complete union removed. His attitude at this time was not unlike that of President Lincoln at a later period of our national history.

Hanson's efforts were rewarded by the passage of an act to empower the delegates of this State in Congress to subscribe and ratify the Articles of Confederation, and accordingly, on the 1st day of March, 1781, John Hanson and Daniel Carroll, as delegates of the State of Maryland, put their signatures to the document which was the beginning of the indissoluble Union of the United States. This having been accomplished, he threw his entire force into the debate on the western land question. That question was settled according to the judgment of Maryland, and out of that vast territory which became the common property of all the States were carved the newer States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and a part of Wisconsin.

John Hanson was three times elected to the Continental Congress, and after his third election was elevated to the position of President of that body. During his first and second terms in Congress he was shown the distinction of being elected also to the lower house of the State. After twenty-five years of public service, rich with the honors that become the man with a clear mind and an incorruptible heart, he retired to private life and spent his last days at Oxon Hill, Prince George County, Md., where he died November 22, 1783.

John Hanson was one of those modest, unassuming great men who seek no glory for themselves, but find their highest reward in the good that accrues from their efforts to the great body of the people. He was essentially a thinker, a contriver, an unraveler of knotty points, a man to whom the people looked when other leaders said, "What shall we do now?" In those days, when there was great diversity of opinion among men of equal ability and patriotism, John Hanson proved himself a master in bringing to the front the central idea and enlisting the support of all men who in their adherence to the chief thought lost sight of minor differences. He was of a reflective temperament, weighing well each proposition, and standing firm by his decisions. Too little tribute has heretofore been paid to those quiet, thoughtful men who have furnished the basic ideas upon which governments have been founded and for which armies have contended. Behind the man behind the gun is the idea, the principle, the conviction, which justifies his use of arms, and without which an army becomes an irresponsible mob. It has been said that it is sweet and beautiful to die for one's country, but it is no less sublime to give to one's country sound doctrine and imperishable tenets. The statue of John Hanson, representing him in a reflective attitude, I now formally present to our country, whose Government he so grandly helped to establish. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution offered by my colleague.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GROSVENOR). The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE].

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce the death of my colleague, Hon. JOHN N. W. RUMPLE, who, at 4 o'clock this morning, after a long and painful illness, was called to his final reward.

Iowa has lost one of her most distinguished and pure-minded citizens; this House has been deprived of one of its ablest and worthiest members, and the veterans of the civil war have lost an earnest friend and comrade.

I will not now speak further of his life and character, but at some future time his colleagues will ask the House to set apart a suitable time for the purpose of paying tribute to his memory.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has learned with deep sorrow and regret of the death of the Hon. JOHN N. W. RUMPLE, member of this House from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That a committee of members of the House, with such members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to take order concerning the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy of the same to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the House do now adjourn.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the announcement of the result, the Chair, with the unanimous consent of the House, will appoint the following committee: Mr. HEDGE of Iowa, Mr. THOMAS of Iowa, Mr. HAUGEN of Iowa, Mr. SMITH of Iowa, Mr. CONNER of Iowa, Mr. HEMENWAY of Indiana, Mr. PRINCE of Illinois, Mr. GARDNER of Michigan, Mr. APLIN of Michigan, Mr. DARRAGH of Michigan, Mr. PAYNE of New York, Mr. GROSVENOR of Ohio, Mr. DALZELL of Pennsylvania, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, Mr. ADAMSON of Georgia, and Mr. CROWLEY of Illinois.

The resolutions are agreed to; and, in accordance with the order previously made, the House will stand adjourned until to-morrow, Sunday, February 1, at 12 o'clock noon.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Sunday, February 1, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 1, 1903.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Clerk read the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1903.

I hereby designate Hon. HENRY C. SMITH, of Michigan, as Speaker pro tempore this day.

D. B. HENDERSON, Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HENRY C. SMITH). Prayer will be offered by the Chaplain.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God and Father of us all, whose thoughts are above our thoughts and whose ways are past finding out, help us with faith to walk where we can not see the way, with confidence to trust where we can not solve the problems, that our lives may be sublime in faith and confidence, heroic in thought, word, and deed. How often in the midst of life and usefulness are those whom we love, honor, and respect taken from us, leaving the mind distracted and the heart desolate! How often has this Congress been visited by the Angel of Death! Only yesterday the sad news came to us that another member of this House has been taken from us, leaving a vacant seat and hearts rent with sorrow and grief. We pray most fervently that those who knew and loved him best may be comforted in the blessed thought that there is no death—that somewhere, some time, there will be a glad reunion. We thank Thee for the beautiful custom which prevails in the National Congress in setting apart a day for the purpose of eulogizing the departed. We are here to-day in memory of one whose life and works still live and will live in the minds and hearts of those who knew him and in the deeds wrought for his beloved country. Help us to emulate what was truly noble, great, and heroic in his life, that departing we may leave behind us the world a little better that we have lived and wrought. Comfort, we beseech Thee, the friends, widow, and children of him whose name we would honor to-day in this service, and Thine be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR M'MILLAN.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions. The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has received with sincere regret the announcement of the death of the Hon. JAMES MCMILLAN, late a member of the Senate from the State of Michigan, and tenders to the family of the deceased the assurance of their sympathy with them in the bereavement they have been called upon to sustain.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a public servant, the House, at the conclusion these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to transmit to the family of Mr. MCMILLAN a certified copy of the foregoing resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, we are mourning to-day the loss of a close and delightful companionship, a companionship which lightened public care and gave pleasure to private intercourse.

I am grateful for the opportunity to lay a wreath of honor and affection on the monument of my esteemed friend, Hon. JAMES MCMILLAN.

"Praising what is lost makes the remembrance dear." "There are three kinds of praise—that which we yield, that which we lend, and that which we pay. We yield it to the powerful from fear, we lend it to the weak from interest, and we pay it to the deserving from gratitude."

If he had never held public office, if his name had never been heard beyond the boundaries of Detroit, he would have been her most favorite and honored citizen in his day and generation.

Michigan has been most highly honored in the Senate of the United States by men of rare genius and ability. Howard, Chandler, Conger, Palmer, and MCMILLAN have severally left an enduring imprint of their great characters upon the escutcheons of the State and nation.

I distinctly remember our first meeting twenty-five years ago, and the enduring impression then made upon my mind of his firm, noble, and dignified character. He was then, though a comparatively young man, among the foremost business men of the city of Detroit. He demonstrated early in life marvelous genius as an organizer, promoter, and operator of vast industrial institutions. He not only possessed the rare faculty of correctly estimating the latent powers and talents of other men, but knew how to put them into forceful and successful operation. Under his masterful guidance men were trained in the practical school of business affairs and made to feel the influence and enjoy the fruits of his genius. He generously shared with his associates the blessings of his prosperity and wealth. By the establishment of great manufacturing institutions and steamship lines he utilized the resources of nature, extended the facilities of transportation, and afforded bountiful opportunity for the employment of well-paid artisans. Labor always obtained its just reward in all enterprises with which he was associated. He was always a modest, dignified, manly man. He met every occasion in life with a simple, firm, and quiet courtesy. There was no yielding, supplication, or timidity in it. He never asked favors, though no man was more willing to grant them. He never attempted to answer other men's arguments, but he carried conviction and moved men by the power of his influence and firm judgment.

Moderation, "the silken cord running through the pearly chain of all our virtues," was preeminently manifest in his character.

In the affairs of men he stood like the great oak of the forest—unmoved by tempest. The waves in the sea of human life, the ever-changing vicissitudes in business affairs, misfortunes, howsoever great, or dangers, howsoever threatening, never disturbed the serenity of his firm character, daunted his courage, or moved his judgment. He was as unyielding as flint and true as steel in the things he stood for, but his flint or steel never struck a spark by collision with any other. He may be justly termed the "silent statesman." In a few words he gave his opinion upon all matters commanding his judgment. Into whatever realm of life he entered the genius of his ability and the wisdom of his judgment dominated. This was true in political as well as business affairs. To political problems he applied business principles and success followed. If misfortunes were met in the pathway of his life, they were unknown to his associates. It has been said, "The world estimates men by their success in life, and, by general consent, success is evidence of superiority."

Judged by this standard our beloved Senator should rank among those of the greatest superiority, for his career was marked by a succession of successes. At home his memory will be cherished as a benefactor because of the establishment of great institutions of industrial life wherein labor finds fruitful reward; in state affairs he will rank next in leadership to the renowned Zachariah Chandler; many beautiful landmarks, public improvements, the recent union station, and other architectural ornamentations to our capital city, largely due to his effort, will stand as monuments to his memory and wisdom. His friends were legion, and his loyalty "grappled them to his heart with hooks of steel." His life was too active and progressive to permit him to stop to punish an enemy. He enjoyed to a marked degree the usual recreations and pleasures of men and found ample time to give to his charming family the devotion of husband and father. The death of a brother, son, and grandson during the last year of his life undoubtedly hastened his end.

Death takes us unawares
And stays our hurrying feet;
The great design unfinished lies,
Our lives are incomplete.

To illustrate more fully his great character, I include in my remarks the following letter from a mutual friend:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 12, 1902.

DEAR MR. CORLISS: I regret that I could not come to Detroit to attend the funeral of Senator MCMILLAN. He was the fairest and squarest man I ever knew in public life. Mr. MCMILLAN always tried to do the right thing. His chief characteristic was his constant effort to be just. The volume and stress of business force strong and successful men of his type to fix rules to guide and control their relationship with men. In following this necessary practice Mr. MCMILLAN gave fine and sympathetic consideration to the infinite variety of human needs, hopes, and conditions. To understand what others felt that they had a right to expect of him he made a duty. Those who sought him received his assistance in making their proposition clear and satisfactory to themselves. He was helpful and not antagonistic. He reasoned from the position of others before he analyzed from his own standpoint. Personal prejudices were kept in the background. He was not arbitrary. Men thought him reasonable, because he reasoned from their viewpoint as well as from his own. His judgments commanded the confidence of men because they grew out of conditions and requirements and were not the impulses of personal desires or the pretext of conveniences.

Senator MCMILLAN was an opportunist. He rarely sought to create conditions, but stood ready to take advantage of them. His marvelous gift of accurately judging men enabled him to confidently trust those who were active in his behalf. Men had to make good to work with him. He made no promises, but remembered services. As a political leader he did not seek to use his party, but to find out the common-sense requirements of his party and see that it was not disappointed in the part he took.

He had more respect for the intelligence of the great middle classes than any man I ever knew. His faith was in workers. They were his partners. To them he gave his confidences and extended aid. The men who were striving to buy homes, to take care of families, and to lay by competences were the ones he believed in. He did not care much whether cents or dollars were involved. Some called him an aristocrat. Perhaps he was. I hardly know what they mean, but if he was he was the right kind. He was a worker, did business with workers, believed in their aspirations, was in sympathy with them, stood for them, employed his full power and strength to be a useful man in the largest and best sense, and earned the honest respect of those who knew the merit of his work. As a rich man he set a pattern which will be hard to excel. It is too bad that his State and his country should be deprived of his services.

Faithfully,

OTTO CARMICHAEL.

Hon. JOHN B. CORLISS, Detroit, Mich.

The tribute of Sir Walter Scott to Fox, in his last resting place, most fittingly portrays the noble nature of JAMES MCMILLAN:

For talents mourn, untimely lost,
When best employed, and wanted most;
Mourn genius high, and lore profound,
And wit that loved to play, not wound;
And all the reasoning powers divine
To penetrate, resolve, combine;
And feelings keen, and Fancy's glow—
They sleep with him who sleeps below.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, this day has been set apart in honor of the memory of the late Senator from Michigan, JAMES MCMILLAN. It had not been my purpose to take part in these proceedings, owing to physical indisposition; but as the time drew near when my colleagues were to give expression to the love and affection in which we hold the memory of our most distinguished son, I could not deny myself the privilege of attending upon this day's session of the House, and paying my brief tribute to the memory of one whom I loved in his lifetime and remember and revere now that he has passed away.

If ever there was a man prepared in every way to live it was JAMES MCMILLAN, and if ever there was a man prepared to die it was JAMES MCMILLAN. His character was so beautifully rounded, his life so perfect in all that goes to make a man, his example so inspiring, contact with him so helpful, that in his death we who have associated with him so many years will lose our wisest counselor and our most trusted leader. He passed out mourned by all the people within the borders of our beloved State, and I think it safe to say that in his lifetime he enjoyed the confidence of more of our people than any citizen of our Commonwealth.

Some public men improve by distance—in perspective look larger. Senator McMILLAN grew with close inspection, and was greater and grander the nearer the view. His life was one of struggle and earnest endeavor. He wrestled with the elements that try men's souls and his attractive personality took on some of the majesty of the storm, rising superbly to every great trust reposed in him. Poor in his youth, he never forgot the ladder by which he climbed, and the friends of his early life were the comfort and consolation of his maturer years. A dutiful son, he ministered to those who gave him birth; a kind father, his children loved him with a devotion unsurpassed, and like him have the confidence of their fellows.

Surrounded by every luxury, in years still but little past the meridian, surrounded by all the comforts that wealth could bestow, in full enjoyment of his splendid powers, with influence as wide as the country's domain, a temperament so retiring, a disposition so modest and so graceful, it had been the hope and expectation of us all that many years of public usefulness and private enjoyment were yet in store for him.

Always interested in the young men of his State, we loved him because of his boundless sympathy and his generous and kindly helpfulness. He never surrounded himself with empty ornamentation, but was accessible to all, regardless of rank or station. Faithful to his duties as a Senator, there was no act of his that would not bear the keenest scrutiny. Powerful though he was, he used that power so gently, so sparingly that many did not realize in his lifetime what a potent figure he was in the affairs of his country. He did not pursue the bubble of high public place that he might use it for his own advantage, but grasped the helm of the ship of state with vigorous hand that it might safely weather the sea in storm and in tempest. JAMES McMILLAN was as great in private life as he was in public office, and the qualities that made him strong in his phenominal business career contributed to his success in the field of public activity. I think it entirely safe to say that there is no Senator of the United States whose personality will be missed so much as that of the one whom we honor to-day.

To have the confidence of those we serve and the respect of those with whom we associate is the highest reward of public service. He had the affection of those he served and the love of his associates, prizes rarely realized in this fitful field.

In the great game of politics we are often reminded of chess. While it is being played, all the men stand in their places and are respected accordingly. First the king, then the queen, then the knights, then the bishops, then the common soldiers. But when once the game is ended and the table taken away, and all are confusedly tumbled into a bag, haply the king is lowest and the common soldier upmost. So in this great struggle of life. We seek the bubble of popular approval at the cannon's mouth; we press the apple to our lips, and lo, it turns to ashes. But in the life of this distinguished Senator, whose death we mourn to-day, we find inspiration, comfort, and consolation, and of such glory as is permanent he had his full share.

The great French soldier, De Latour d'Auvergne, was the hero of many battles, but remained, of his own choice, in the ranks. Napoleon gave him a sword and the official title of "The first grenadier of France." When he was killed the emperor ordered that his heart should be intrusted to the keeping of his regiment and that his name should be called at every roll call, and that his next comrade should make answer "Dead upon the field of honor."

So, Mr. Speaker, the nation gives back to Michigan all that is mortal of Senator McMILLAN, and we take it to our hearts and will preserve his ashes in the soil he loved, and when the roll of the distinguished men of Michigan shall be called his illustrious name will ever be pronounced, and there will always be someone ready to answer in his absence, "Dead upon the field of honor."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to add my mite to the wreath of honor we have met this day to lay on the grave of JAMES McMILLAN. For many years I was closely associated with him in public and legislative matters. His long-continued service as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia in the Senate brought us together many times in conference and for consultation, so that I came in closer contact with him than with almost any other member of the United States Senate.

I early learned to admire his character and to respect his judgment. To me he was the ideal Senator, ripe in years and experience; one whose efforts in a business way had been crowned with success, and one whose public service had been recognized not only by his own State, but by the nation. Independent in all things, successful in all things, he was peculiarly fitted to discharge the duties of his high office. In committee, in conference between the two Houses, he was gentle and considerate of the opinions of others, yet, when he believed that he was right, was firm and unyielding. No influences could reach him except those which appealed to his sense of justice and right.

He was a stanch friend of the District of Columbia, and his death was their great loss. I believe that one of the great if not the greatest ambitions of his life was to beautify and develop the capital, and make it the most attractive city in the world.

His character was written in his face, and one had but to know him to admire the influences which governed his every action, for it is one of the compensatory laws of nature that the thoughts we think, the hopes and aspirations we entertain, our wishes, our moral make-up, in short, our character, sooner or later in life, become engraved upon the face in lines that can not be effaced, and tell to the world the kind of life that we have lived.

I believe this was true of Senator McMILLAN. His face fully expressed the life that he had lived, the forceful, earnest character, the great, kind heart, and that gentle consideration he had for others.

When the story of the city of Washington is told in years to come his name will be a household word. He left his work unfinished, but set for us an example that we should all be proud to follow.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, it is not an easy thing to interpret into words even a single phase of the character of one we know or have known.

It is a difficult thing to put in words even our own impressions about ourselves. Few men really understand one another.

An idea seldom presents itself to two minds in the same form. When I talk about another man I am reminded of Dr. Holmes's idea about the three Johns and the three Thomases, always engaged in any dialogue between John and Thomas.

I knew JAMES McMILLAN as a Senator of the United States from the State of Michigan, with whom my duties as a Representative in Congress from that State brought me in frequent and friendly contact.

He was born in Canada in 1838. He quit school at the age of 14 and graduated into a hardware store in Hamilton, Ontario, where he worked for four years. Then he came to Detroit, where he worked two years in another hardware store. He then became purchasing agent for a railroad company, saved some money, made some investments, acquired some capital, and finally became a partner in the Michigan Car Company.

Thereafter he widened the scope and increased the number of his investments from time to time until he died a multimillionaire.

In 1879 he succeeded Zachariah Chandler as chairman of the Republican State central committee of Michigan and was chairman in 1886, 1890, 1892, and 1894.

He became a United States Senator in 1889 and held that position until his death, August 10, 1902.

I am not concerned overmuch with the fact that JAMES McMILLAN became a rich man. He lived in an era of tremendous progress, enterprise, invention, and discovery, and had the courage and sagacity to take honorable advantage of his opportunities.

You can not always judge heroism nowadays by the amount of the prize money; neither can you judge of a man by the size of his bank account.

Of course there are a great many people who immediately inquire how much money a man is worth if you assert that he is an able man. To such people it will be plain without further inquiry that JAMES McMILLAN was an able man.

But to JAMES McMILLAN his wealth and the things that his wealth brought him were but the externals and equipment of a strong man running his race.

The probate court has to do with his material estate; what of the man?

He was born in the possessive case and he left some millions, but what else did he leave? He was a keen, successful business man, but what else was he?

At Atlantic City I have seen artists in sand who, out of piles of sand on the seashore, could shape forms of beauty that slept or smiled in the sunlight until the rising tide obliterated them. So men heap up shapes of beauty and pile up possessions here on the edge of eternity which the tide of years obliterates.

We are all artists in sand mostly, but while we and our works are soon submerged by the rolling years there is one thing that survives us, sometimes for a long time, sometimes for a short time, subject to the understanding and misunderstanding of those who measure us with their measure, and that is character.

JAMES McMILLAN was what is known as a self-made man, but he was not in the habit of advertising the fact.

He demonstrated, as many another man has demonstrated, that it is possible to get an education without going to college, and yet, like most such men, he was keenly alive to the importance of a college education.

He realized that money devoted to education is devoted to the highest economic uses, and gave liberally to educational purposes.

Like most great men and institutions, he was quiet, strong, and unostentatious. A supreme court is much less noisy than a justice's court.

He was a charitable man, but he never advertised his charities.

Starting with nothing, he accumulated colossal wealth, and while accumulating it he promoted public enterprises and scattered private benefactions along the way of his success.

He was always a genial man, and his geniality was tempered with the kind of tact which enabled him to check undue familiarity.

Mixed with a splendid generosity, a warmth of soul, and kindness of heart, there was always the ruggedness of the Scotch hills of his ancestry and the climate of his birth.

He seldom made mistakes through "the will's defect or the blood's excess."

He was not an orator, and yet he had a power of analytic statement unencumbered by verbal embroidery, highly satisfactory to a mind seeking information.

He was a keen judge of men and motives, and was never known to make any investments in Utopia. A sham always shriveled in his presence.

If he had imagination, it did not haze his judgment. Neither did he take counsel of his prejudices.

In business, as in politics, he acted upon the theory that to tell the truth is the best diplomacy; to go straight the shortest way.

He became a leader in Michigan politics, not because there was any beating of tom-toms in his vicinity, but because he was absolutely steadfast and reliable, and men always knew where to find him.

His legislative career was that of a broad-gauge, honorable business man, applying business methods to national concerns.

There never was a time when integrity was more essential to business and political success than now. Let it be rumored in the commercial world that a man's "word will not inform you what he means to do," and the commercial world, by common consent, determines that he is not a man to bargain with.

JAMES MCMILLAN'S word was as true and undeviating as the figures cut in steel on a carpenter's square in the hardware stock he handled when a boy.

As a statesman he was always practical. He never had any idea of trying to steer the ship of state to the Hesperides, and he was never for a moment a demagogue. He had no part with politicians who hang on agitation for what they can pick up.

He had the same contempt for cheap men who want to be conspicuous that Carlyle expresses in his Hero Worship when he says: "Examine the man who lives in misery because he does not shine above other men; who goes about producing himself, pruriently anxious about his gifts and claims; struggling to force everybody, as it were begging everybody, for God's sake, to acknowledge him a great man, and set him over the heads of men! * * * He can not walk on quiet paths. Unless you will look at him, wonder at him, write paragraphs about him, he can not live."

JAMES MCMILLAN was never solicitous about having people crane their necks to see him.

He went along quietly attending to a good deal of public and private business, but wasted no vitality in trying to make himself conspicuous and no money on press agents.

He had no newspapers subsidized to admire him.

In the midst of plenty he lived an absolutely temperate life.

He gained for himself honor and glory. Glory is a good thing, but it goes hand in hand with villification. He had both. Prosperity breeds jealousy, and jealousy breeds rivalry. History is full of consolations for the obscure.

Many men regard politics from a very personal standpoint. For one friend who is loyal without thought of collecting a dividend from his friendship there are always several other kinds of friends, waiting in ambush and otherwise.

He was closely identified with the progress and development of his home city of Detroit.

As chairman of the District of Columbia Committee he was practically mayor of Washington, and at his instance a commission of experts formulated plans for the artistic improvement of Washington, which, as they take material shape, will form memorials to his enlightened public spirit.

And it came to pass that when the man sat in his house at rest among the trophies of an honorable career, Death summoned him.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, we have met together this Sabbath day—and there could be no more fitting and appropriate occasion—to pay our tribute of respect, love, and affection to the honored dead.

The last time I looked into the kindly face of Senator MCMILLAN, while living, was the day he left this city to go to his summer home at Eagle Head, near Manchester-by-the-Sea.

I have visited with him many times during the last six years, in the place where we were the most accustomed to see him, in the committee room of the District of Columbia near by the Senate Chamber, and I recall no time when he was more cheerful or seemed in better health. He was the very picture of health. He spoke of having overtaxed himself with committee work, and said that he felt the need of a change and rest, which he was about to take, but that he would soon be as well as ever.

He briefly reviewed the work of the session, referring in his usual pleasing way to what had been accomplished, and more especially to legislation affecting Washington and the District. After a most pleasant visit, which I shall always remember, he bade me good-bye, saying he would see me in Michigan in September or October.

Which one of us did not expect to meet him and again receive his kindly greetings?

What a shock when on the 10th of August following, without a word of warning, we were summoned to hear the startling and painful news of his sudden and sad taking away.

A leading Detroit paper said: "Not since the morning of November 1, 1879, when Zachariah Chandler was found dead in his bed in the Grand Pacific Hotel in Chicago, has the passing of a citizen of Michigan produced the shock, both in the State and nation, which followed the wholly unexpected announcement of the death of Senator JAMES MCMILLAN." Radically as the two men differed in temperament there was a rough parallel between the career of that sturdy old leader of the youthful Republican party and that of his masterful successor, which continued even to that last sleep, from which there is no awakening in this life.

On every hand and from people in all the walks of life there were heard expressions of the most profound sorrow and grief. Page after page could be filled with the many beautiful and heartfelt tributes which came from every portion of the country. Ex-Governor Luce said, "Michigan will not soon see his like again."

Senator MCMILLAN was a "self-made man." He came from Ontario to make a fortune in the young Republic, and he succeeded in this as he did in all of his undertakings.

His eventful life, so full of activity, so complete with many good deeds, is an incentive to all young men, and for whom he always had an encouraging word. It was not an uncommon thing for him to make investments for the purpose of helping young men start in life.

He was born in Ontario in 1838. At the age of 14 he left school and went to work, preferring a commercial to a professional life.

What a striking parallel between the early life of Zachariah Chandler and that of Senator MCMILLAN. Chandler's father offered him a college education or $1,000 in cash with which to begin business. He chose the latter and went to Detroit to build for himself a lucrative business. Senator MCMILLAN could have had the education, but he preferred to go out in the world and hew out his own future and fortune, which consisted not only of money, stocks, and lands, but a good name, a spotless character, an unsullied reputation, and the esteem and confidence of his fellow-men, which will prove an enduring monument, more lasting than stone or brass.

At the age of 18 he is working in a hardware store in his adopted city at $60 per month. At 20 he is the purchasing agent of the Detroit and Milwaukee Railroad, a very responsible position for one much older.

At his majority he is superintending the extension of the same railroad, and his ability was again manifested by the adjustment of a strike among the men, whose confidence he won.

In 1860 he was married to Miss Mary L. Wetmore, of Detroit, and to them six children were born. At this time he was receiving a modest salary, and together they commenced housekeeping in a small house just back of his residence on Jefferson avenue, which is only one of several beautiful homes he owned and occupied at different seasons of the year.

At 23 he is again the purchasing agent of the same railroad and is reputed to have saved $5,000. At 24 he decided to engage in the ice business. This was his first business venture.

At 26 he assists in organizing the Michigan Car Company, which has grown into much larger proportions since, and it was only one of many manufacturing institutions which he was identified with at the time of his death. He was not only largely interested in manufacturing, but was a stockholder in the banks of his city and was also a large holder of real estate. When we recall the many enterprises with which he was associated we marvel that one mind could have accomplished so much. He was truly Michigan's largest business man.

After attaining this proud position he turned gradually away from an active business life to engage in politics. He pursued the same course in politics that he did in business; he was content to begin at the foot of the ladder. In 1874, 1875, and 1876 he was a member of the board of estimates of the Seventh Ward of Detroit, and a member of the park commission in 1881, 1882, and 1883. He was a member of the Republican State central committee for several years; was also its treasurer in the memorable greenback campaign in 1878 when Zachariah Chandler was chairman. Later on he was chairman of the committee during several campaigns, always leading the party on to sure and certain victory.

He was not an orator, but a man possessed with the divine gift of excellent common sense. He did not care to speak, he preferred to act; he wanted results; he did not often address the Senate, but when he did he was listened to with the closest attention. His speeches upon the tariff, currency, and wool may be termed the only set speeches he made in thirteen years' experience.

He was often heard advocating some plan for the improvement of Washington. The national capital has lost one of its best and most influential friends. As chairman of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia he was foremost in carrying out the work of beautifying, adorning, and making Washington the most beautiful city in the world.

The Republican party, recognizing his ability and conspicuous services, elected him to the Senate in 1889, and he was reelected in 1895 and 1901, always the unanimous choice of his party, and in the election of 1895 enjoyed the honor of receiving the vote of every member of the legislature, which had been conferred only once before in Michigan's history.

It was on this occasion that Senator Joseph R. McLaughlin in presenting his name to the caucus said:

> Charity and benevolence know him. He believed that wealth was a gift of God, to be shared by the children of penury or devoted to institutions that contemplated a general good. Forty years ago, leaving home and friends and kindred, he came to this country of great possibilities from a neighboring land, to join hands and fortunes with us. With what success his efforts have been rewarded you know full well. The wheels of industry sing his praises. The white wings of commerce salute him prince of men. While American traditions last, while the noblest sentiments of the heart are drawn in admiration to the honest efforts of the poor boy struggling for success in the world, while America is America, men of his type will be respected and honored.

It has been the lot of but few men, and especially for one without any legislative experience, to enter the greatest lawmaking body in the world and occupy, as he did, a foremost place early in his Senatorial career. At the time of his death he was a member of the following important committees: Chairman of the District of Columbia, Commerce, Naval Affairs, Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, Relations with Cuba, Coast and Insular Survey.

It was in the committee room or in conference rather than in the Senate Chamber where he did his most effective work. He was one of a little coterie of Senators who controlled and shaped the legislation of the Senate and of the nation.

He died at the period of his greatest usefulness.

His success in life is a splendid tribute to his ability.

His name and fame will go down in history with that of Cass, Chandler, and others of Michigan's distinguished sons.

He was a charitable man, as will be shown by his many gifts in the city of Detroit and to various State institutions of the State which he honored and served so well and which to-day mourns his sad and untimely taking away. One who was closely associated with him during the years when he accumulated his wealth has said, "It was the joy of his life to help along his fellowmen and aid the unfortunate. No worthy cause was ever presented to him for assistance without receiving a generous response, and it was his habit to say, 'If you want more, you know where to come for it.'" His predecessor in the Senate, Hon. Thomas W. Palmer, said of him, "His faults, if he had any, were so overshadowed by his virtues that they never will be cited in the story of his life."

His loss to the city of Detroit, the State of Michigan, and in the councils of the nation will be more keenly felt as the years go by.

He was a kind, courteous, dignified, pleasant, Christian gentleman, a good and true friend, and as such I bid him an affectionate farewell.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, though JAMES MCMILLAN was born on this side the Atlantic, there coursed through his veins pure Scotch blood transmitted by parents both of whom were native to the land of Scott and Burns. His father, a man of high character and marked ability, was honorably connected with important business enterprises in Canada, the land of his adoption and the birthplace of him whose life is commemorated in this service. The late Senator MCMILLAN came to the United States when a youth of 17 and settled in Detroit, Mich., which was ever after his home while living and where his mortal remains are sepulchered.

As a business man, Mr. MCMILLAN was for many years recognized as one of the most successful in the Middle West. He began the career which won him distinction in the financial world by acceptably filling for two years a subordinate position in a mercantile house in his adopted city. He then entered a larger field of activity, as purchasing agent of an important railroad-building undertaking. He here gathered the experience and gained the acquaintance and confidence of his superiors, all of which stood him in good stead in later years. Refusing a flattering offer to go to Spain and embark in railroad-building ventures, he entered, in 1863, at the age of 25, upon a business career which had to do with enterprises having their ramifications in various States and in different countries, involving in the aggregate the investment and expenditure of many millions of dollars. To but call the roll of these varied concerns, to say they were successfully conducted, and that JAMES MCMILLAN'S was the master mind in conducting them is to pay only a just tribute to his ability as a business man and financier.

He was one of the organizers of the Michigan Car Company, which gradually became the largest single industry in Detroit. He established car companies in London, Ontario, and in Kansas City. He purchased and through his younger brother conducted the car works at St. Louis, Mo.

Mr. MCMILLAN was the leading spirit in the organization of the Detroit Wheel Company, the Detroit Iron Furnace Company, the Baugh Steam Forge Company, the Fulton Iron and Engine Works, the Newberry Furnace Company, and the Detroit Pipe and Foundry Company. He built and until entering the Senate was president of the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic Railway. It was under his leadership that the international bridge was constructed at Sault Ste. Marie. He became interested in lake transportation, and at the time of his death was possessed of large maritime interests, and was president of the Detroit and Cleveland Navigation Company.

It has been said of him that no man ever lived in Michigan who did so much to build up Detroit, the metropolis of the State, or to develop and utilize the resources of that great Commonwealth.

One of the distinguishing features of his business career was his ability to select with almost unerring sagacity the subordinates who were to fill important positions and to share in the responsibilities of conducting his vast and varied undertakings. Another characteristic was the liberality with which he treated his subordinate chiefs, not only in the matter of compensation and the impartation of his confidence, but in making them sharers and participants in the success of the particular branch of business with which they had to do. Not a few men now in the prime of prosperous careers are indebted not only for their business training, but their financial start, to this broad-minded and liberal-hearted man.

From these successes and fortunate business ventures on a large scale Mr. MCMILLAN, at the end of a series of years, emerged with an established reputation as an honorable, farseeing, and successful business man, and with an acquired fortune which, even in these days of colossal accumulations, is regarded as princely.

In political life we think of Mr. MCMILLAN only as Senator. But men rarely come to that great office without having had some previous experience which demonstrated their ability and fitness for the high station. In this respect Mr. MCMILLAN was not an exception to the rule. As early as 1874 he was chosen a member of the Detroit board of estimates, later he served on the board of park commissioners, and still later as a director in the museum of art. In each and all of these positions he discharged the duties devolved with credit to himself and acceptability to the city.

His introduction into State politics was through his relation to the Michigan Republican State central committee. In that body his organizing and executive ability early gave him a recognized standing with his fellow-members, and when Zachariah Chandler died he was chosen to succeed, as chairman of the committee, that great leader of men.

As the administrative head of his party through several successive campaigns he so favorably impressed himself upon the Republicans of his State that in 1889 he received a unanimous nomination for the United States Senate. In 1895 he received for his second term the vote of every legislator of both parties, and again in 1901 he was chosen for a third time without a contest.

I will leave to others the agreeable task of dwelling upon his Senatorial career and content myself with saying that he gradually gained and firmly held the confidence of his fellow-Republicans in the nation, as he did in the State, as a wise, sagacious, and patriotic leader. No man since Chandler has been so potent a force in the politics of his State, and no Michigan man since Chandler has been so influential in the capital of the nation.

But JAMES MCMILLAN was more than a successful man of affairs, more than a statesman, though as such his services to his country were of recognized value; he was a philanthropist. The field of his benefactions, like that of his business enterprises, was varied and was subjected to the same discriminating judgment. He was the founder and the constant friend and helper of Grace Hospital—which bears the name of his cherished daughter, deceased—one of Detroit's noblest humanitarian institutions, which represents at this time in buildings, equipment, and endowment a half million of dollars.

Among the thousands of students in annual attendance at the Michigan University the lovers of Shakespeare, through the liberality of Mr. MCMILLAN, have access to one of the finest American collections of the works of the great dramatist.

He gave to the Michigan Agricultural College, one of the oldest, best endowed, and most numerously attended of its class, its famous entomological collection, from which the State and the nation are deriving benefits through the advantages it has placed within the reach of its students.

On the campus of Albion College there stands a noble building, erected solely through his generosity and dedicated to the cause of science. Daily, in term time, its spacious rooms are thronged with bright and brainy young men and women in search of knowledge in the science of life. From its halls many teachers have gone forth to impart instruction in that which they there learned under such favorable conditions.

In far-away Texas, whose soil was never pressed by the feet of this lover of men, an institution designed to uplift and ennoble the daughters of negro mothers was the recipient of large donations. At this hour the grandchildren of those who were bondwomen share in the healthful and purifying influence of this man whose native air never filled the nostrils of a slave.

These are among the visible evidences of his liberality and are illustrative of his broad view of the needs of men as well as his response to the solicitations of those who appealed to his generosity. It is but just to his memory to say that none of these was given with ostentation, none was accompanied by self-advertising, nor were they used for self-exploitation. They are known because they have a tangible existence; but who can tell, save Him who hears the orphan's sigh, the strong man's moan, or notes the widow's tear, how many were ministered to by the left hand of this practical philanthropist when the right hand knew it not?

Two acts done on the last day of his life, the knowledge of which was conveyed to the recipients in the last letters ever written by him whose life went out so suddenly, are indicative of the innumerable benefactions of this princely man. One of these letters carried the joy of relief to a husband and father whose home was imperiled and which would certainly be lost unless aid came quickly; the other conveyed a generous response to the appeal of a woman, a stranger to him, but the worthy widow of an honored and influential citizen. After a careful investigation and being fully satisfied that she was deserving, he remarked in confidence to another, "I can not bear to take the consequences of refusal to an appeal like that." So saying, he lifted his pen and signed his name that carried with it some hundreds of dollars and removed the weight from a burdened heart. It was his last signature. A fitting close to a life filled with worthy deeds and great accomplishments. A few hours later his own great heart had ceased to beat, and this friend of man and servant of God had passed from the living.

If we seek the governing influence under which this business man built a name and character which young men may well strive to emulate; if we ask whence this statesman's gentle yet controlling power as an incorruptible leader of men and shaper of legislation, or where the hidden spring from which flowed this ever widening and deepening stream of benevolences, may we not find answer to all these in the fact that he was born of Christian parents; that the life principles of the Master Teacher were early instilled into his nature; that in his mature years he was a constant reader of the Divine Word; that he early identified himself with and to the end of his life remained a faithful, consistent, and effective member of the Christian church? The Christ man was a dominating force in shaping the life and character of JAMES MCMILLAN. He lived and died a Christian.

Mr. SHELDEN. Mr. Speaker, we have met to-day to pay the last sincere tribute of respect and esteem to a dead friend; to show by our presence and our words that we have been the gainer through the life and influence of the late JAMES MCMILLAN and by our association with him. Of him, indeed, will we all join in saying, "the good that men do lives after them."

I shall, Mr. Speaker, address myself to the memory of JAMES MCMILLAN as a friend "faithful and just to me."

How futile it would be of us in a passing hour and in the weakest of all methods, a few printed words upon the page, to try and portray the results of his life; a life that it took years upon years of thought and patient persistent toil to make perfect.

Long after this hour and its tribute shall be forgotten; long after it shall cease to be remembered, even as the legislative footnote on the death of a member, the works and results of JAMES MCMILLAN'S life will remain as a lasting and permanent memorial and monument to his memory in this city.

When Washington, the capital of the fairest nation on earth, shall take rank as the most perfect capital in the world, then will it be time to write the history of JAMES MCMILLAN'S life work. Then only can it be written. For then will the observant mind see in every beautiful structure that shall hereafter grace this city what the hand of the craftsman has wrought on the plan that the late Senator from Michigan conceived and started.

Vast as was Mr. MCMILLAN'S work here and in his home State, where he was allied with immense interests, it is as a loyal friend that he will be best remembered by those who held him in greatest esteem, those who were permitted to get closer to the real man and see the wonderful self-poise and mastery of self that enabled him to rise above every obstacle and stand undismayed in every climax. There was in his friendship so much of deep and true loyalty, so much of fidelity to the advancement of his friends that this phase of his life is the most beautiful to me.

Two cities and a great State mourn his death, but posterity can afford to be thankful that he left so much for the benefit of his kind and the good of his country at large.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, the nation and its lawmakers were greatly shocked on a quiet Sunday last August by the unexpected and sad news from Manchester-by-the-Sea that Senator JAMES MCMILLAN had passed away in the night.

His illness was of the most brief duration. The last day, before the night of his death, had been devoid of distinguishable sign that the conqueror of all mankind was so near. Indeed, the Senator had been in strong and robust health, and in his health-seeking exercise had displayed his old-time vigor. A slight indisposition, a little later in the day, was followed by a rally that left him apparently in perfect physical condition. That indisposition was but the forerunner of the end, but human eyesight could not perceive it, and in the night, with but the briefest spasm of illness, the elect of the great State of Michigan had passed to that bourn "from whence no traveler returns."

JAMES MCMILLAN occupied a peculiar place in politics, and the combination of circumstances which landed him at the head of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia was, as posterity will see demonstrated, the most kindly move that fate ever made for the capital city of the nation.

JAMES MCMILLAN, as a business man of large and varied interests, brought to the Senate that practical experience which afterwards proved of such great value to the city.

He had no political training in the meager, smaller way, as his first office was that of United States Senator from Michigan. Almost from the outset, when he was made a member of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, he began to suggest and urge reforms, and when greater power, through legislative experience, came to him, he pushed those reforms to a successful termination. Devoid of ostentation, he made no boast of what he would do, but quietly accomplished it and then rested content. His was not a nature of the vain-glorious, self-praising sort, and the changes he wrought were so peacefully and smoothly brought about that the results were the first the world knew of the movement.

We all regret that he was so soon called from earthly labor to eternal rest, but we glory in the fact that he was permitted to live long enough to start that thoroughly comprehensive and grand plan for the glory of "most beautiful Washington." When that plan shall have been carried out and when future generations shall behold the completion of the plan which he conceived and started, then will the grandeur and greatness of JAMES MCMILLAN'S life work be realized. He contributed more than his mite to the future, and the future will recognize it.

JAMES MCMILLAN was a natural leader of men. Coming from a small inland city in the Dominion of Canada, he brought to the shores of his adopted State nothing but the native wit and sturdy manhood of his people. He indeed started from the lower round of the ladder, but it was not long before he began to mount. Step by step, at first, and then by leaps and bounds, until, long before his public life opened, he dominated more and larger interests than any other man in his State, and where he dominated at all he dominated absolutely and completely.

Having perfect mastery of himself and all that he touched, he added to this self-centered control those lovable traits of character that endeared him most to those who served with him. A sturdy, unswerving loyalty—which appealed most strongly to those nearest to him, because they saw more of it than others—was his strongest personal characteristic. Rewards for faithful service in his behalf, whether in business life or in politics, was as certain as the service itself, and where JAMES MCMILLAN gave his word, there he gave, as surely, the performance of that promise.

A great State mourns an illustrious adopted son, a nation's capital misses his guiding genius, and we of the Michigan delegation feel the deep loss of a friend and leader. We mourn him the most because we have lost the most. No human being can erect a monument to the memory of JAMES MCMILLAN that will be as lasting as the work he has done here in Washington.

The future glory of this city will be his monument for all time.

Mr. APLIN. Mr. Speaker, a good man has gone just at the time when life was most enjoyable and his usefulness greatest. The life of legislative acquaintance is short at best, but long enough for men of the stamp of the late JAMES MCMILLAN to leave their impress upon legislative history and to intensify the bonds of friendship that bind men to each other.

JAMES MCMILLAN was a success in life. He was more than that. He was a good man for his home city, where his remains rest; he was a good man for his State, where his fame will never dim nor its luster be lost as an example for rising youth; he was a good man for this capital of the nation, for out of the magnitude of his experience and out of his desire to make the city of government the most beautiful and characteristic city in the nation he evolved a plan which will be carried out. This plan was his ruling desire, and in his death the city of Washington can well join the people of Michigan in bewailing his departure from the scene of his usefulness.

He needs no monuments of brass or stone. The capital of the future will bear the stamp of his genius and thought; and when "most beautiful Washington" becomes the actuality, then will the ideal of the late Senator from Michigan become the real and his name will be coupled with its growth and fame. Here in the seat of government can his friends, with singular propriety, repeat of him the motto of his State, "If you seek his monument, look around you."

Let us not consider the suddenness of his taking off. At the height of his power and strength, just when he had about reached the climax of his career, when he had but to wait and behold the culmination of the plans he had conceived, the summons of the Supreme Ruler of the universe came. JAMES MCMILLAN'S name was called, and he answered. Who shall say that he would have wished it otherwise? He might have lived to do more, but he had done enough to win from his fellow-men of this and future time the commendation, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

As in life we followed his advice, so in death we will abide by the example of his work and worth and be better men and better citizens for having known JAMES MCMILLAN.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, we have met to-day to commemorate the life and mourn the death of that strong and noble man, JAMES MCMILLAN. Sixty-four years would seem a shortened span for one of so equable a temperament and well-ordered life. Necessarily, even if a man live to be fourscore, his life work will be left incomplete, but Senator MCMILLAN has left a lasting impress. In commemorating his life his fellow-members in the Lake Carriers' Association quoted these words:

> He did not fall
> Like drooping flowers that no man noticeth,
> But like a great branch of some stately tree,
> Rent in a tempest and flung down to death.

His decease would seem to be an irreparable loss to the city of Washington, for he had given the benefit of his excellent judgment to its complicated affairs for many years, and had inaugurated plans for its improvement and beautification which must be of great permanent advantage. The thousands and tens of thousands who annually visit the national capital will return home more proud of their country and more patriotic citizens because of the improvements which he inaugurated. The foreigner who visits us and who often goes home forming his judgment of the country by the capital alone, will see here no signs of royal pomp, but utility and beauty worthy of a great republic. It would be fitting indeed that, within the limits of this city, he should be commemorated by a statue of marble or brass, but he has left a more enduring monument in his practical activity for the betterment of the city of Washington.

He was interested in the commerce of the country, primarily in that of the Great Lakes, where he was a large owner of ships. His work here is not incomplete. He lived to see that traffic grow to enormous proportions; he lived to see many channels which had been dangerous for the navigator made safe by broadening and deepening and lighted, so that the pathway of the sailor was made clear. In his activity for the commercial development of the country he did not belong to Michigan, but to the United States.

His activities were not restricted to his immediate locality, but with broad vision he comprehended the commercial needs of the whole country. While not an impracticable enthusiast, he was no pessimist. He appreciated as few men did the commercial and industrial possibilities of this country. In his private career he was not one of those Napoleons of finance who have a facility in absorbing for themselves the accumulations of others; his success was the upbuilding of the community in which he lived. He gave employment to thousands, and added not to his own possessions merely, but to the prosperity of the whole country. He was not an orator, but he had that excellent discernment, that poise and calmness which made his counsel invaluable. Oftentimes when measures were being considered in the Senate it was a better argument for their enactment than elaborate statements or eloquent appeals to know that Senator MCMILLAN had given them his approval.

Such an influence as he exerted can not come from intellect alone or from mere shrewdness in business, but must rest upon moral qualities; for in legislation, as in everything else, that which makes men most influential is, after all, the moral quality. This he possessed in an unusual degree. Everyone knew that he had a desire to do justice; that he had a judgment free from any bias, from any influences which might lead him astray. In private life this same disposition was shown. He did not stop with steadfastness in his loyalty to his friends. His heart took in as well the unfortunate, the struggling, those in distress. His name will be remembered, not merely by the hospitals he endowed, the libraries which he assisted; it will be perpetuated in the young men who felt the quickening force and the encouragement of his friendly words and his kindly assistance.

Not alone Michigan will remember this influence, but throughout the country there will be felt the effect of the career of a brave, true man, who went on his way with success, with industry, and with earnestness, yet at the same time imparting the influence of his good deeds around him.

At such a time as this when death is brought near to us we are wont to ask the question, "Does death end all?" Is there an immortality here or hereafter? Is there not some place in this boundless universe where those who have labored hard and nobly here will find an abiding place? I believe that for Senator MCMILLAN there is an immortality; there is an immortality here due alike to his statesmanship, to his qualities of mind and heart.

After all, men are judged by the little things of life; and by this standard he must occupy a very high place. He is worthy to be counted with that great army whose graves are on the land and in the sea—who have diffused sweetness and light all around, who by quiet and unostentatious yet constant deeds of goodness have made life more tolerable and have contributed to bring this earth again to its original condition as a garden of beauty and of enjoyment. Truly, if the good deeds of all these were to be written down, the world would not contain the books which would be written.

Whatever may be our creed—whether we have any creed at all—I think it must afford us satisfaction to know that in his life he was guided by Christian principle and in his death was sustained by Christian hope. And in commemorating such a life our hopes are big with immortality. Just as it is said that we are evolved from lower grades of existence—that the human species is an advanced type—so we may hope that there are still higher grades of existence for immortal souls, and we may say—

> Eternal process moving on,
> From state to state the spirit walks,
> And these are but the shatter'd stalks,
> Or ruined chrysalis of one.
> Nor blame I death because he bare,
> The use of virtue out of earth;
> I know transplanted human worth,
> Will bloom to profit otherwhere.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I am persuaded to take the time of the House to speak of the life, the worth, and the character of the late Senator JAMES MCMILLAN. The example and the good influence of such a life and of such a character ought not to be lost.

Senator MCMILLAN was also the representative of a new school in politics—the honest, sincere, practical, and effective public servant, working to the purpose that government should be by and for the people and not by and for the politicians—a class to be emulated and encouraged.

He was born at Hamilton, Ontario, May 12, 1838, the second son of William and Grace McMillan, who came there from Scotland in the year 1834. His father was prominently connected with the Great Western Railway and with other large enterprises, and was a strong man. Like this son, the father was perfectly fearless in any cause which he believed to be just. He, too, was keen, energetic, at all times on the alert for opportunities by which he could better himself, and he had the same sterling integrity, and was at the same time also a most agreeable man socially and devoted to his family.

His ambition for James was a college course and a finished education in the schools. But the commercial instinct dominated the son; he quit school and conducted a store for some years. Then the rising Republic attracted him and led him to believe that opportunities were greater here, and in 1855, without means, acquaintances, or friends, he moved to Detroit, Mich., where he engaged as a clerk for a well-known hardware firm, on a meager salary. Two years later, through the influence of his father, he became purchasing agent for a railroad company. He developed business thrift without wealth's greed; honesty which was its own herald and required no boosting, it was natural; genialty without profusion; he was bright, not caustic; he never wounded others, and did not push others aside or climb over them. Direct and true, he hit the mark and won gloriously. To but enumerate and describe the large business concerns with which he was connected and over which he exercised commanding influence would be almost to give a history of the great business of the city of Detroit and of the State of Michigan.

His holdings at the time of his death covered many branches of business—railroads, real estate, bank and telephone stock, mining, car shops, boat buildings, navigation, and industries of all kinds.

He had an income of $300,000 a year, and died worth $5,000,000. And he earned it all, unaided, by his commanding ability. It has been said to be praise enough of another that "he wrote no line which dying he could wish to blot." It is a most welcome thought that when we lay the measuring rod upon the life and deeds of Senator MCMILLAN we find no line which we would wish to blot. He had not one dollar which the world might not know where and how he got it; there is no taint upon his fortune, no mar upon his business integrity. He won fairly all he had. Not by cunning manipulation, nor by the natural rise in the values of properties, but by his foresight, energy, ability, and absolute and unqualified integrity he gave value to the properties he managed. He did not hurt his fellow-man; he "blazed the trees" of new enterprises, and stood in a class alone.

He succeeded because he worked, because he was shrewd, because he was honest, and had and merited the confidence and trust of those who traded with him. Because he selected the good and shunned the bad. No bad passion disfigured his life. And goodness, after all, is the final test. His life is a record of thrift, integrity, and patriotism which others seeing will strive to follow. It is a solemn thing to lead such a life; its example will leave a good and lasting imprint on the State and the nation.

The poet has said:

Success is labor's prize;
Work is the mother of fame.
And who on a boom shall rise
To the height of an honored name?
The bee by industry reapeth
The stores which enrich the hives.
All that is thrifty creepeth,
For toil is the law of lives.
And he who reaps without sowing
A bitter harvest reaps.
The law of gradual growing
Is the law that never sleeps.

He brought into his public and political life the same principles, the same ability, the same integrity, work, and fidelity, and a lofty patriotism. In all of his political life he was unflinchingly upright, and he demanded the same integrity from those with whom he held any relations. He gave full credit to honesty, but would not countenance sham or pretense of any kind.

He became the unanimous choice of the Michigan legislature for United States Senator, and no taint of money marred the choice.

When he became a public servant he divorced himself from private enterprises; interested in transportation, he refused in the Senate a position on the Interstate Commerce Committee.

His work as chairman of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia is appreciated, and his memory will always be sacred in Washington, the District, and the nation. He directed the affairs of the District with the same business sagacity and prudence which made his own business life such a success.

He had three great purposes: First, to overcome the feeling that the District was not to be generously aided; second, to make the improvements permanent, substantial, and on a scale suitable to the capital of a rich, powerful, and generous people; and third, to beautify in an artistic and a worthy way the wonderful city of Washington. It was his aim and ambition that this should be the most beautiful capital city of the world, as it is the capital city of the strongest, the most patriotic, and the most generous nation of the earth. If in the days to come the Congress shall carry out what his mind had the ability to conceive and what he had the courage to stand for, this great capital, where sentiments of loyalty and national pride and national honor are made, and policies of growth and thrift and stability and justice are formed, will indeed be the place where the people of the globe may come for lessons in the best government of man.

This is monument enough, in memories cherished, sacred and enduring; but beyond his ability, beyond his wealth—and those who knew him best never thought of his riches—beyond his public services, beyond all was the man. "He was a man; he loved his fellow-men, and ministered unto them when they were sick." He was as generous as he was noble. During all of his busy life he did the duty of a good citizen, in the ranks, in caucuses, in conventions, everywhere. "Who would be chiefest among you must be servant of all" was the inspiration of his life. In times of financial disaster he did not await the call of anguish, but tendered, unasked, needed help and gave with free hand and in abundance.

On his funeral day the wheels of industry, which had sung his praises in the music of progress, were still. The churches, the colleges, the libraries, and the hospitals that had known him were shrouded in somber hues. The laborers who worked and toiled for ample pay by reason of his life joined in the universal lament. Smoke was dead in chimneys under which his thrift had built furnace fires; the blinds of bank and shop were drawn, and boats on river and lake bore flags of mourning. House and Senate will miss him, Detroit will miss him, Michigan will miss him, the District and the nation will miss him. Labor and capital will miss him, charity will miss him. But home and friends will miss him most.

Friends are in life's exchange the sterling coin,
True tender for all the rarest forms of joy;
The only pauper is the friendless man.

We join in the full chorus of respect and affection for the polished man, the faithful servant, the cherished friend.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, on account of the unavoidable absence of other members who desired to speak upon this occasion, I ask unanimous consent that general leave to print be granted for ten days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that general leave to print be granted for ten days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And now, pursuant to the resolutions heretofore adopted, and as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House stands adjourned.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 2, 1903.

Prayer by Rev. F. J. PRETTYMAN, of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. CULLOM, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

STATE MILITIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, pursuant to law, an abstract of the returns of the adjutants-general of the several States of the militia thereof; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EAST WASHINGTON HEIGHTS TRACTION RAILROAD COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company for the year ended December 31, 1902; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SPANISH TREATY CLAIMS COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 19th ultimo, information relative to contracts for fees of attorneys. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to the communication and asks what disposition he wishes to have made of it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the communication.

There has been a great deal of uncertainty and lack of information as to the extent of the claims that have poured in a great tide before this Commission, and the object of my resolution was to have the facts in relation to the claims elicited. I had previously introduced a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, providing for a limitation on the fees of attorneys before the Commission. That limitation was neglected in the act which created the Commission. It has been applied and was enforced in other great commissions, where the amounts claimed were large, like the Alabama Claims Commission and the Indian Depredations Claims Commission, but it was omitted in the act which constituted the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission. That bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which had charge of this subject, but it has not been reported.

In my resolution I asked the Commission to send in a report so that we might have some view of the extent of the performances that are going on before the Commission. The report is a very interesting one. After a moment I shall ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have looked it over and made some memoranda.

The claims have been presented under the act of March 2, 1901, which has as its foundation the well-known provision of Article VII of the Spanish treaty, which is as follows:

The United States and Spain mutually relinquish all claims for indemnity, national and individual, of every kind, of either Government, or of its citizens or subjects, against the other Government, that may have arisen since the beginning of the late insurrection in Cuba and prior to the exchange of ratifications of the present treaty, including all claims for indemnity for the cost of the war.

The United States will adjudicate and settle the claims of its citizens against Spain relinquished in this article.

After that Congress created the Spanish Claims Commission, and the President appointed its members and they set to work. Already 542 claims have been presented, amounting to $61,672,077. Contracts with attorneys were filed to the number of only 67. The amounts claimed in the 67 cases are $10,294,797. In these contracts the percentage to be allowed to attorneys runs from 5 per cent to 50 per cent, or an average, as I thought, looking them over, of about 33 per cent of the entire sum claimed. Of this $10,000,000, $3,140,476 will be absorbed by the attorneys if there are full recoveries.

The attorneys in all these claims are resisting in every possible way any action that will limit or restrain their charge of fees. I do not suppose that that has had the least to do with the inaction on the part of the committee in not reporting the bill. The Committee on Foreign Relations are very busy and they have large subjects before them. But I wish to say here and now to that committee that this matter is of importance enough for them to look into the bill referred to it and report it back at the present session of Congress.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to state for his information that the committee has had the subject under consideration and has discussed the bill more than once. There seemed to be a difference there in regard to it, and the result has been that in the pressure of affairs the committee has not finally come to a conclusion.

I wish to say that so far as I am concerned, I agree with the Senator that action ought to be taken on the bill. I think the fees of attorneys ought to be limited in such cases, as they always have been heretofore, as I understand it, where commissions have had charge of claims against the Government.

Mr. HALE. I am very glad to hear the chairman of the committee make that statement, and I shall have accomplished all that I seek here if what he indicates is carried out by the committee and a report is made.

I take it that no question can be raised as to the desirability of limiting the fees of these attorneys. They do not want to have their fees limited. The commission never hears anything of the parties themselves. I do not suppose the identification of a single claimant by his appearance before the commission has taken place, but the attorneys are constant, their presence is pervasive, and they do not want to have their fees limited.

In the Alabama Claims Commission we limited them, and the court settled in each case what the attorney should have. All the sums were paid to the parties themselves, with the exception of the allowances to the attorneys. When we passed the Indian Depredation Claims Commission act we put on just such a provision as I have provided in the bill which has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That provision I find here in volume 26 of the Statutes. At the outside those claims were only about $30,000,000. It provided that the fees of attorneys should not exceed 15 per cent in ordinary cases and 20 per cent in any case. In small cases the fees might be larger than 15 per cent.

Mr. President, here is an instance showing how far away this is. Of 390 claims shown by this paper, 262 in number are pressed by naturalized citizens, and only about 90 by native citizens and United States corporations. The claimants are not here. They are represented by their attorneys. They will never be seen—I make no reflection personally upon the attorneys, but the combination of the attorneys is tremendous to prevent any kind of limitation to their fees.

There is another point, but that I do not go into now. There is a bill pending in which they desire appeals to the Supreme Court. Whether that bill should pass or not I do not know. That does not come up now, but all of the attorneys are for it. Here is an immense aggregation of claims that if not followed up and scrutinized carefully and the fees of the attorneys limited will amount in a few years to tens of millions of dollars, which the Government will have to pay.

I ask now simply that this reply, which is most interesting, shall be printed and referred. I have picked out these facts from the communication. Let it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I hope the committee will find time in the midst of its great duties to report soon.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire if it is the opinion of the Senator from Maine that there ought not to be any appeal. Where questions involving $60,000,000 are pending there must be a great many serious questions of international law to be settled.

Mr. HALE. The bill is not up now. It of course raises a very important question whether the act of a commission of this kind should be transferred to the Supreme Court where a precedent is made which may bind us for the future; but we can not debate that now. I am not prepared to say that I am in favor of granting the right of appeal, but that question will come up at some other time.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Maine took the floor, and I should like to know what claims he is discussing.

Mr. HALE. I will repeat in a few words that some days ago I presented a resolution in relation to the Spanish Claims Commission. There is a bill pending to limit the fees of attorneys. There are no limitations now as there have been in the cases of other great commissions. Upon my motion a resolution was sent to the Spanish Claims Commission asking them to send us information about these claims, the extent and the classes they cover, so that the committee might have that information in its examination of the bill limiting the attorneys' fees. What I have been saying is in relation to the report, calling attention to certain quite interesting facts that have been brought out in this paper. It is all on the question of limiting the fees of attorneys before the Spanish Claims Commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to say to the Senator from Maine, if I may be permitted, that his bill is before the committee, as the chairman has stated, and that it has been discussed more than once. Personally I favor it very strongly, but there was a great deal of division of opinion about it and no action has been taken. The committee, as the chairman has stated, has not neglected the bill. I agree entirely with the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I should hope that there would not be any longer opposition to limiting the fees of attorneys in all these cases.

I ask that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA, DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of South Dakota, Secretary's Office:

I, O. C. Berg, secretary of state of the State of South Dakota, do hereby certify that the attached instrument of writing is a true and correct copy of house joint resolution No. 7, as passed by the legislature of 1903, as the same appears of record in this office, and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of South Dakota. Done at the city of Pierre this 29th day of January, 1903.

[SEAL.] O. C. BERG, Secretary of State.

A joint resolution by the house and senate of the eighth legislative assembly of the State of South Dakota, memorializing the Congress of the United States to ratify the existing treaty with the Rosebud (Sioux) Indians for a cession of all that portion of their reservation lying in the county of Gregory, S. Dak., and praying that provisions be made for opening said tract to homestead settlement.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That whereas one James McLaughlin, as United States Indian inspector, did on the 4th day of September, A. D. 1901, make and conclude an agreement with the male adult Indians of the Rosebud Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, for a cession of certain described lands lying and being in Gregor County, S. Dak.; and

Whereas said body of land, comprising approximately 416,000 acres, is reputed to be fertile in soil and rich in all natural resources, needing only settlement and development to transform it into one of the choicest spots of our great State; and

Whereas in its present state the coveted land brings no revenue to the Indians and they desire to cede it, as evidenced by their treaty; and

Whereas the acquisition of this Territory to the taxable area of the State would mean the addition of thousands to our population and the enlargement of Gregor County, which is now so small it can not maintain a county government without an annual deficit even with an excessive tax levy: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, in justice to both the Indians and our State, implore the Congress of the United States to hasten a ratification of the existing treaty and to provide ways and means for the early opening of this splendid body of land to homestead settlement, under such restrictions and conditions as they may deem wise.

Mr. KITTREDGE presented a petition of the Black Hills Mining Men's Association, of Deadwood, S. Dak., praying for the establishment of a department of mines and mining; which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. SIMON. I present a petition of the legislature of Oregon, praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of settlers on lands in Sherman County, in that State. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial No. 3.

Whereas JOHN H. MITCHELL, on March 14, 1902, introduced into the Senate of the United States bill S. 4530, entitled "A bill for the relief of settlers on lands in Sherman County, in the State of Oregon," which bill reads as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate and ascertain the reasonable value, respectively, of the lands settled upon and heretofore claimed by the respective persons whose names are set out in full in Senate Document No. 8, second session Fifty-sixth Congress, and in Senate Document No. 240, first session Fifty-seventh Congress, and in which documents are also specifically stated an accurate description of the lands claimed by each of such persons, respectively, together with the value of the improvements thereon, respectively, all of said lands and improvements to be determined, in all cases where such settlers have been dispossessed of their lands, as of the date of the ouster of such settlers, respectively, from said lands by either The Dalles Military Wagon Road Company, or the Eastern Oregon Land Company, successor in interest of The Dalles Military Road Company, in pursuance of the judgment and decree of the Supreme Court of the United States affecting the title to said lands; and it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the dates, respectively, when such settlers, or any of them, were respectively dispossessed of such lands; and in all cases where any of such settlers are still in possession of the lands so claimed by them, respectively, the value of the same and of the improvements thereon shall be determined as the date of the passage of this act.

"SEC. 2. That upon the ascertainment of such values of said lands and improvements, respectively, as hereinbefore provided in section 1 of this act, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to issue to said settlers, severally and respectively, a certificate of indebtedness, in which it shall be stated the exact amount each of such settlers is entitled to in accordance with the ascertained value of such lands and improvements as provided for by the first section of this act, and on the presentation of such certificates by such settlers, respectively, to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States warrants shall be drawn in favor of such settlers, respectively, for the amounts, respectively, so ascertained to be due by the Secretary of the Interior as aforesaid, which warrants shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient to meet the payment of all such warrants so drawn as aforesaid.

"SEC. 3. That in the event of the death of any such settlers the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain and certify the value of such lands and improvements in the name of the legal representatives of such settler so deceased, and payment shall be made to such legal representatives in like manner as above: Provided, however, That no assigned claim of any settler shall have any recognition under the provisions of this act."

Therefore,

Resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, memorialized to enact said bill into law at the earliest practicable moment, as the same is a most meritorious bill, in the interest of a class of settlers on the public lands in eastern Oregon, which lands were at the time entered and settled upon by the several parties referred to in the bill declared by the Department of the Interior to be public lands of the United States and open to settlement, and which were subsequently, after homes had been established thereon and large amounts of money expended respectively by said settlers, declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to belong to The Dalles Military Wagon Road Company, or its successor, the Eastern Oregon Land Company.

Adopted by the Senate January 14, 1903.

GEORGE C. BROWNELL,
President of the Senate.

Concurred in by the House January 15, 1903.

L. T. HARRIS,
Speaker of the House.

Mr. SIMON. I present a petition of the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, praying for the improvement of the Columbia River between The Dalles and Celilo, in that State. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Joint Memorial No. 1.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We, your memorialists, the legislative assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that the Columbia River, with the exception of a very short distance between The Dalles and Celilo, in the State of Oregon, is navigable all the year for boats of average tonnage from the Pacific Ocean to Kettle Falls, in the State of Washington, a distance of more than 700 miles; that owing to the topography of the country through which the said river flows the producers of the vast region known as the Columbia Basin, which comprises an area of not less than 2,300,000 acres, mostly arable land, can cheaply reach the markets of the world with their products only by means of the channel of the Columbia River, and for that reason the removal of all obstructions to navigation therein and the consequent reduction of transportation rates is a matter of most urgent necessity; that the obstructions to navigation alluded to can be overcome by the construction of properly equipped canal and locks between the points named; that a careful survey and plans for such canal and locks, with detail drawings and estimates, have been made under the direction of Capt. W. A. Harts, Engineer Corps, United States Army, which shows that the probable cost of such improvement would not exceed $3,962,000.

Your memorialists therefore pray that said improvement be speedily commenced and vigorously prosecuted to an early completion.

Adopted by the Senate January 13, 1903.

GEORGE C. BROWNELL,

Concurred in by the House January 14, 1903.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to present two petitions. One of them is headed by Bishop Huntington, bishop of central New York. It recites that the information which the American people have had in regard to affairs in the Philippine Islands has been almost falsified by later and fuller information, or by the events, and that a committee charged with investigating that subject by the Senate ended its labors, leaving many witnesses not called and many subjects requiring information unexplored, and therefore petitions that the Senate authorize the Committee on the Philippines, or a subcommittee thereof, to sit during the recess of Congress to obtain the information needed by the people for the proper administration of that dependency, and that Congress make a suitable appropriation to pay the expenses thereof.

The other petition is headed by President Schurman, of Cornell University, and is signed by Rev. William R. Huntington, the very eminent clergyman who is rector of Grace Church, New York, and by other well-known and eminent names. The petition recites that the time is now auspicious for an unimpassioned and impartial investigation of such matters, that the present season is far removed from a political campaign in this country and nearly a year removed from a military campaign in the Christian provinces in the Philippines, and making, therefore, the same prayer.

I ask that the petitions may be received and referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made in the absence of objection.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of the Pomological Society of the State of Maine, praying that an appropriation of $2,500,000 be made for the erection of a new building for the use of the Department of Agriculture; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

FRAUDULENT AND SPECULATIVE LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I present certain communications from the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, relative to the number of commuted homestead, timber and stone and desert land entries attacked on the ground of fraudulent and speculative intent. I move that the communications be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

CHAPLAINS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. CULLOM. I present certain articles, representing the views of eminent divines and others, recently published chiefly in the religious press, relating to Congressional legislation in behalf of chaplains in the Navy. I move that the articles be printed as a document.

An act (S. 5316) providing for an additional circuit judge in the eighth judicial circuit; and

An act (S. 5914) establishing a regular term of United States district court in Addison, W. Va.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that 2,000 extra copies of the bill (H. R. 15331) to amend an act to limit the effect of the regulations of commerce between the several States and with foreign countries in certain cases, approved August 8, 1890, and the accompanying report be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

STATUE OF GEN. HENRY LEAVENWORTH.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 138) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for a life-sized statue of Gen. Henry Leavenworth, at Leavenworth, Kans.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS-MARTIAL IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. RAWLINS on the 27th instant, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to inform the Senate what courts-martial have been ordered and held in the Philippine Islands, and what judgments rendered by them in consequence of the dispatch sent by the Secretary of War to Major-General Chaffee referred to in the memorandum of the Secretary of War for the Adjutant-General under date of April 15, 1902; also what action was taken by the President or the Secretary of War on the judgment of any court-martial so ordered, either approving or disapproving the same.

Also, that the records in full of the several following courts-martial ordered and held in the Philippine Islands be communicated, to wit:

That on Maj. Edwin F. Glenn, Fifth Infantry.
That on Lieut. Edwin A. Hickman, First Cavalry.

That on Maj. L. W. T. Waller, of the Marine Corps.
That on Lieut. Preston Brown, Second Infantry.
That on Capt. James A. Ryan, Fifteenth Cavalry.
That on Lieut. —— Cooke.
That on Lieut. Julian E. Gaiyot.
That on Lieut. N. E. Cook, of the Philippine Scouts.
That on Lieut. W. S. Sinclair, battalion adjutant, Twenty-eighth Infantry.

Also, any record or reports of investigations which may be on file in the War Department relating to the case of the so-called "Father Augustine," alleged to have been put to death by Cornelius M. Brownell, formerly a captain of the Twenty-sixth Volunteer Infantry, at Banate, island of Panay, province of Iloilo, in December, 1900; also any investigations made by the Department of Justice into the facts of such case, together with any legal conclusions reached thereon and reported to the War Department.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, if the resolution can be passed without debate I believe I will forego making the remarks I intended to make in regard to it.

Mr. LODGE. I think, Mr. President, that I made a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Philippines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the pending motion.

Mr. BERRY. In view of that motion, I want to say a few words before the resolution is referred. I shall occupy but a very few minutes.

Mr. President, I think this resolution ought to be passed and that it ought not to be referred to the Committee on the Philippines. I think so especially in view of the defense which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] has made of Captain Brownell. I do not think I ever heard a more remarkable defense put forward to excuse and acquit a man charged with wrongdoing. The Senator from Vermont stated that Captain Brownell had been charged with cruelty, and the Senator sent to the Clerk's desk and had read a letter signed by Captain Brownell, which has just been printed in the RECORD.

Captain Brownell says in his own defense that this priest, Augustine, had been professing friendship for the Americans, while at the same time he was acting as treasurer for the insurgents. Captain Brownell says, having heard of this man, to use his own language, he had ordered him to be delivered to him on a United States gunboat; that he caused this man to be taken to his headquarters, and that he there informed him that he had reliable information that this priest, Augustine, had a certain amount of money which belonged to the insurgents; that Captain Brownell tried to persuade the man to give him an order for the money, but the priest refused; that thereafter, after using all the arguments that he could, he directed that the water cure, so called, should be applied to this priest so as to compel him to give an order for the money; that after the man had undergone that treatment Captain Brownell again tried to reason with the priest, who again refused; that Captain Brownell thereupon ordered the application of the water cure a second time, and that, finally, suffering from the torture inflicted by Captain Brownell's order, the priest said he would sign the order for the money, and he did sign it.

The officer says he had promised this man the very moment he signed the order that the punishment would cease, but after the order had been signed, he says that he had been directed to find out the whereabouts of a certain Filipino colonel; and so he called on this priest to give him that information. The priest refused; whereupon, notwithstanding the officer's promise that if the priest would give an order for the money further punishment would not be inflicted, he directed the water cure to be again applied to the priest because he refused to tell of the whereabouts of the Filipino colonel; that he continued to refuse, when the water cure was again administered, and that the priest died while they were inflicting the punishment upon him. True, he says, that he got a physician to certify that the priest was not drowned by the water, but that he died, I think the statement is, from fatty degeneration of the heart.

That is the defense which the Senator from Vermont puts into the RECORD for this American officer, who says in his defense that he inflicted this torture, that the man died while it was being inflicted under his orders, and that his motive and purpose in doing so was to make the man give an order for the money. That is the statement which the Senator from Vermont thinks is sufficient defense for this American officer. I want to read now just a word or two from the statement made by the Senator from Vermont about this matter, who had read the defense of this officer before he made the statement. The Senator from Vermont said:

Mr. President, Capt. Cornelius M. Brownell was a Vermont officer. I have known him well for years. There is no better specimen of the volunteer soldier in Vermont or in any other State than Captain Brownell. He was a captain in the militia before the Spanish war.

Now, we are told—and the statement goes to our young men at West Point, who are being trained for officers of the Army—that a Senator of the United States, a former Secretary of War, regards this man as the best specimen of an American volunteer officer. I am not here to heap epithets of abuse upon Captain Brownell, but he has put into the record over his own signature statements which ought to condemn him in the mind of every fair and humane man in the United States. He says that this priest, under the operations of the torture which was inflicted upon him by his order, died, and that the motive which actuated him to inflict the punishment was to force this man to give to this officer an order for money; and that is defended upon the floor of the Senate of the United States!

It will be remembered that this man, Captain Brownell, comes from one of the older States of this Union; from a State which prides itself upon the education of its people, which claims that they are peculiarly enlightened and civilized Christians, and especially that they are humane. He comes from a State whose people have often concerned themselves about the wickedness of other people, but they never concede that they have any wickedness of their own; and yet the Senator from that State tells us that this officer, who deliberately and coolly, by torture, murdered a man, the motive being to obtain money from him, is to be held up as the highest specimen of an American officer. It may be that the sentiment of the country has gotten to that point, Mr. President; but it seems to me that if we should allow what has been said here to pass as a sufficient defense for an act of this kind and nothing be said to controvert it, this Senate would be placed in the position of having approved what the distinguished Senator from Vermont has said.

Of course, as I have said, I have no words of abuse to put upon this officer; we have no statement except his own; we have not the statement of any other witness; and the statement which has been presented to us is the statement of this officer. If there be doubt as to the statement, I can read it. After having inflicted this torture, Captain Brownell says:

> Endeavoring in all this proceeding to act in a gentlemanly manner, but firmly, I told him that the idea of compulsion was abhorrent to an American officer.

This officer says that, and yet we are told that his act was excusable and justifiable. I believe, Mr. President, before this unjust, unholy, and disgraceful conquest of the Philippine Islands was undertaken, if an American officer had perpetrated such acts as this officer has admitted he perpetrated, he would have been universally condemned from one end of this country to the other; but the men who forced that war feel it incumbent upon them to defend every act committed in its prosecution.

I want to say that in making this statement I am not attacking the Army of the United States. I hope and believe that there are but few officers aside from this one who would have ever perpetrated an act of this character; certainly there are few who would ever have undertaken to defend it by admitting it. What I say applies to that officer. I do not seek to apply it to others. In fact, in the statement made here it will be found that the officer says when he went the last time to inflict this punishment—I will read his own language, so that I may not misquote it:

> I directed him to be conducted to a house apart from the headquarters in order that he might be quietly and carefully dealt with, as the night guard was on at headquarters and there were a large number of enlisted men within hearing.

It seems that even he thought that it was necessary to conceal from the enlisted men this diabolical act. I regret that any man wearing the American uniform should ever have perpetrated such a crime, and I more regret that the Senator from Vermont should have attempted to justify it on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator from Vermont defended Captain Brownell, and continues to do so, and he resents the imputation of the Senator from Arkansas that Captain Brownell was guilty of murder. Captain Brownell is an intelligent and cultivated officer and gentleman. He was in a situation there which must be considered before he is to be judged. He was only a captain, removed from communication with any superior commander and surrounded by this treachery, which has been made apparent. He knew that this man, whom he had in his custody, was the prime mover in instigating the treachery and the massacre that was contemplated and almost accomplished. It was the duty of Captain Brownell to protect his command, and he did it by the best and the only means he could use. It was a method, much as we may criticise it, that was the means of saving the lives of many American soldiers, as well as those of thousands of Filipinos.

The result in this particular case was that that district was pacified at once; the presidentes and the principales that had been engaged in this conspiracy to massacre the Americans came in at once, asknowledged their guilt, and gave allegiance to the American Government, and there has been no trouble since that time.

Captain Brownell was a most excellent officer. The Senator from Arkansas was, I believe, a good soldier, and if he had been in that critical place would have met the situation and preserved his command, and have done his duty by his country in so doing.

The Senator from Arkansas speaks of Vermont as being engaged in missionary enterprises for the reform of other countries. I am not aware that we have ever undertaken anything for the improvement of the conditions in Arkansas, and I am willing that they shall be compared with the conditions in Vermont now or at any other time.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, of course, if the Senator from Vermont sees proper to approve the conduct of this officer as stated by himself, that is a question for the Senator. As to the statement of the Senator that he resents what I have stated, I do not know just in what way or how he proposes to resent it. That is also a question for the Senator.

Now, I want to say here that when the Senator from Vermont said that I, under any character of circumstances, under any provocation, or under any conditions, would inflict torture upon a human being, I tell him that he is not acquainted with me. There is no power on this earth that could induce me either to do such a deed or to approve it after it had been done.

I have only stated what Captain Brownell himself said, that he caused this torture to be inflicted, and the man died while under its operation. The Senator from Vermont says that he resents the idea that that was murder. The Attorney-General has decided, I believe, in an opinion given by him, that this officer can not be tried; that he can not be tried by the military tribunals, because he has been discharged from the Army, and that he can not be tried by the civil authorities, I presume, because there was no law in that country, but simply the arbitrary will of the executive department of this Government, and therefore the man goes free; but I assert on this floor—and there is no lawyer here who will deny it—that in any State of this Union, before any jury, after such an admission and such a confession as that made by Captain Brownell, he would be adjudged guilty of murder—there can be no doubt about it—because he inflicted this punishment and must have known the consequences that would follow. The motive which actuated him, he himself says, was to make this man give him an order for money. If there is any other element which would go to make the crime murder except determination to take life, and that for a bad motive, I do not know what that element is.

I do not care, Mr. President, to say more on the subject at this time.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I intended to say a few words in reference to the resolution, but as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] wishes to call up for consideration the Army appropriation bill, I will waive making any remarks at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What shall be done with the resolution?

Mr. ALLISON. I was about to say a word in reply to some suggestions which have been made in respect to the resolution, but, as I have stated, I defer doing so in order that the Senator from Vermont may call up the appropriation bill in his charge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What shall be done with the resolution?

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If other Senators desire to speak upon it, I ask that the resolution and the motion to refer may go over, the resolution retaining its place.

Mr. ALLISON. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the resolution go over, retaining its place? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

POST-OFFICE AT INDIANOLA, MISS.

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely want to make a brief explanation, with the permission of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROCTOR. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. TILLMAN. On the 24th of last month the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] called up the Indianola post-office matter, and made a speech on it. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], who is more directly interested in that subject than anyone else, answered that speech, and the two Senators occupied all the time until 5 o'clock, when there was a special order for the consideration of pension legislation. I had wished to say something in regard to that matter, but the Senator from Wisconsin leaving the city the next day, I felt unwilling to call it up during his absence. Now, the Senator from Mississippi is absent, and he asked me on Friday, when he left, not to call up the matter during his absence. So I shall have to wait until some time when these two Senators are present, when I hope to have something to say about the Indianola post-office and cognate questions.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to say to the Senator that I will stay here.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was not supposing for a moment or even hinting that the Senator from Wisconsin would not stay here.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16567) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, the amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs to be first considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments shall first receive consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

JAMES HUNTER.

Mr. TELLER. I want to submit an amendment to the Army appropriation bill——

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator proceeds to do that, with the permission of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], I desire to ask for the consideration of a very small bill, which will take but a moment.

Mr. TELLER. I will withhold my amendment until the Senator from Georgia can call up his bill.

Mr. BACON. With the consent of the Senator from Vermont, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16564) granting an increase of pension to James Hunter.

Mr. PROCTOR. I yield if the bill will create no discussion.

Mr. BACON. I am sure it will not.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of James Hunter, late of Captain Hardin's company, Georgia Volunteers, Creek Indian war, and to pay him a pension of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS, ETC.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Vermont yield to me, that I may enter a motion?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 3112) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to determine all claims of the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians of Colorado was passed. I will call it up at some later time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Vermont yield to me for one moment? I will confiscate but a moment of his time.

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. I rise again to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the fixing of a day and an hour when the final vote shall be taken upon what is known as the omnibus statehood bill. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that on Wednesday, the 18th day of February, at 2 o'clock p. m., the vote shall be taken upon the statehood bill and all amendments then pending or that may then be offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent——

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the request. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that on the 18th day of February, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, the final vote be taken on the measure known as the statehood bill and on all amendments that have been offered or which then may be offered. Is there objection?

Mr. NELSON. In the absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], the chairman of the Committee on Territories, I object.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from Indiana is absent. I have sent for him.

Mr. QUAY. The Senator from Indiana was apprised that I was going to make this request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment, was on page 18, line 6, after the word "retirement," to insert:

And any officer of the Army now on the active list below the grade of major-general who served with credit as an officer or an enlisted man in the regular or volunteer service during the civil war before April 9, 1865, shall when retired be retired by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with the rank an pay of the next higher grade. This section shall apply to officers who have been retired on or since the 11th day of August, 1898, but shall not apply to any officer whose service on the active list does not exceed thirty-five years, and shall not apply to any officer who has been placed on the retired list by virtue of any act of Congress nor to any officer who has already received an advance of grade at the time of retirement, or with a view to retirement.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move, at the end of line 10, to strike out the word "shall" and insert "may."

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the word "shall," in line 10, and inserting "may."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. In line 12, after the word "rank," I move to strike out "an" and insert the words "and retired;" so as to read "with the rank and retired pay of the next higher grade."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that there has been put into this appropriation bill, an annual appropriation bill, a body of law, of general legislation, that should be considered as a separate measure, reported by a committee as a separate measure, and acted upon by the Senate as a separate measure. I am inclined to think, although I have not examined it, that the provisions here in this bill, the annual Army appropriation bill, are, if not precisely, almost exactly like those which the Senate has considered and passed.

But I want now to enter my protest against making appropriation bills the vehicle for general legislation. If it is done in cases where it is deemed likely that another body may not pass a general bill, it will always be proposed as a vehicle by which general legislation shall pass. I do not think, Mr. President, that is a good condition. I do not think it ministers to due consideration and deliberation.

I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this bill why it was that upon an appropriation bill for the coming fiscal year his committee has interpolated this body of general legislation?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know to which particular amendment the Senator from Maine refers as general legislation.

Mr. HALE. To section 2.

Mr. COCKRELL. If he refers to the staff and retired pay, I say emphatically that they are not general legislation.

Mr. HALE. They were reported, I am told, from the committee as general legislation——

Mr. COCKRELL. It is true they were reported.

Mr. HALE. And passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; the bill is under consideration now, on a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was passed.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think that this, which is entirely new matter, pertaining to the organization of the Army, is not general legislation?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; it is not general legislation. No plainer proposition has ever been made to the Senate, in my judgment, than that the staff bill, as it is called, is not general legislation.

Mr. HALE. It is not the law now?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; it is practically the law now.

Mr. HALE. Then the Senator——

Mr. COCKRELL. Here are certain staff officers. Now, this authorizes their assignment to certain kinds of duty. Under the Constitution and the general law the President probably possesses every one of those powers. It is not delegating any more than he has now, except that they wanted these duties prescribed, and we are prescribing just exactly what the officers, for whose salaries we appropriate, shall do to earn their salaries. It has been universally held, whenever the question has been presented to the Senate, that when we appropriate to pay a man for his services we have a right to provide what he shall do.

Mr. HALE. There is no general staff corps now. This is understood thoroughly. It has been regarded in the Army as a desirable thing to create what there has never been before, a general staff corps, and this does create it. The bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs as a proper and separate measure of general legislation creates the staff corps. The mere question whether it deals with their salaries is immaterial. I do not say it may not work well, but there never has existed any such staff corps as is provided for here.

I was not inclined to make the point of order, because I am not certain but that the legislation in itself may be desirable; but as the Senator from Missouri has declared that it is not general legislation, I certainly do not wish to have it pass on the theory that I for one accept it. If it is not general legislation to create a staff corps, never existing heretofore, with new duties, and thereby practically revolutionizing the command of the Army, then I do not know what general legislation is.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I rise merely to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, has the undoubted right to order men upon staff duty and to organize a staff corps as he may see fit. But the practice has grown up of having an officer who is called the Commanding General of the Army, and in legislation he has been referred to as such. It would create some confusion for the President, by an executive order, to create a staff.

The real purpose of legislation on the subject is to avoid the confusion and to make it clear and to pave the way to get around the difficulties in administration which would arise, not from want of authority in the Commander in Chief to appoint and organize the staff, but simply because of the way in which we have legislated without foreseeing this condition.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Ohio is talking about one thing and I am talking about another. The Senator is talking about the desirability of Congress doing it rather than to leave it to the President. Quite likely the President may make such designation as he chooses with reference to the duties of officers. The President can, by order, direct every soldier in the Philippine Islands to be brought home. But if Congress should report a measure of that kind it would be general legislation. The fact that the President can do it does not in any way take it out of the domain of general legislation. The question as to what the power of the President is does not touch this question. Here we are creating by law a new corps, a great corps in the War Department, a corps which has never existed before. It is general legislation as much as if we undertook to deal with any other Department. I will reserve the point of order.

I do not make it, because I am by no means certain that is not in itself valuable legislation, but I do not like to see, and Senators ought not to like to see, general legislation on appropriation bills. I will say this about committees. Committees are not appointed here simply for the purpose of taking bodily matters that are suggested in the way of legislation by the heads of departments and dumping them into appropriation bills. Committees ought to scrutinize that carefully, and say to the Secretary or the head of the department, "We can not do that on an appropriation bill." I am afraid there is not independence enough in committees about these things.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, the President would not probably by order establish a general staff corps, naming it that; but aside from that, I think all the duties that are devolved by this amendment on the general staff corps the President might now order. It certainly would be within his province to designate any duties that the officers should be called upon to do. That is the substance of it.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think that the President has authority now, without a change of law, without general legislation, to order retired officers to a particular duty and to give them full pay?

Mr. PROCTOR. I was not speaking of that feature; I was speaking of the staff corps.

Mr. HALE. That is a part of section 2. I am talking about the entire section 2. It is filled with general legislation, Mr. President.

Mr. PROCTOR. The President would not, of course, have authority to do that, but that seemed to the committee germane, as it is a distribution of the appropriation bill. It is an arrangement as to how it shall be distributed to the different officers.

Mr. HALE. The question of its being germane, if the Senator will allow me, has nothing to do with the case. That is another question. The question is whether it is general legislation on an appropriation bill. That is the only question. Being somewhat in doubt as to whether this is not desirable legislation, I will not now make the point of order, but will reserve it to the end of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. On page 18, line 18, before the word "act," I move to insert the word "special;" so as to read: "any special act of Congress."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I wish merely to say, in brief, that I differ from the views of the Senator from Missouri in that I believe these amendments to be general legislation. I also differ from the views of the Senator from Maine in that I believe they are properly in this bill. But as I am in favor of the amendments and no point of order is made, I do not propose to raise one or to embarrass the passage of the bill.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator from Missouri whether he adopts that view? Does he think that general legislation can be properly incorporated into an appropriation bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not unless it is directing the expenditure of the money that is appropriated.

Mr. HALE. That it relates to the special subject of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. The subject-matter.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not believe in doing that. Mr. President, there is another question. I look back to line 16, on page 16, and here is a direct change of law:

Duties now prescribed by statute for the Commanding General of the Army as a member of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification and of the Board of Commissioners of the Soldiers' Home shall be performed by the chief of staff or other officer designated by the President.

Now, that is not a thing which without this legislation the President can do, because the statute declares that certain duties shall be performed by the General of the Army, and this declares in terms that they shall not be done by the General of the Army, but by some one else designated by the President.

I will reserve the point of order at any rate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator is right about that. Those are mere formal duties, and that clause might just as well be stricken out.

Mr. HALE. Striking it out does not satisfy me. It is not my objection to the particular clause. I am inclined to think that it is a good clause, and it is undoubtedly; but I wish the Senator in charge of the bill would face the thing boldly and squarely, as the Senator from Pennsylvania does, who says it is general legislation and it ought to be on an appropriation bill because we can get it through easier and quicker in that way. That is what I wish the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Missouri would do. I do not quite expect the Senator from Missouri to do it, because he is a veteran here, and he knows how important it is that general legislation should not go on appropriation bills. But the Senator from Vermont has not had the enfeebling experience of the Senator from Missouri, and I should be very much better pleased if he would come right out boldly and squarely. I am not certain but that I would not urge the point of order if he would tell us plainly that we can get this through quicker by putting it on an appropriation bill than in any other way, and that is why they put it on.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, under the subhead "Retired enlisted men," on page 19, line 4, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter, in computing the length of service for retirement, credit shall be given soldiers for double the time of their actual service in China, the same as is now given in Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippine Islands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. What became of the amendment on page 18?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was agreed to as amended. No point of order was made.

Mr. HALE. I reserved it on the whole of section 2.

Mr. LODGE. There is some misunderstanding about that. It was reserved on that amendment as well as the other.

Mr. HALE. I reserved the point of order on section 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the whole of section 2?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; the whole of section 2.

Mr. HALE. The whole of section 2, to the bottom of page 18.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order can be made in the Senate just as well as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. Just as well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Senate may as well agree to the amendment now, and then if the point is to be raised it can be raised in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. That is all right.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous," on page 20, line 17, before the word "deposits," to insert "soldiers;" and in line 19, after the word "deposits," to insert:

Provided, That officers of the Army shall have the right to deposit money upon the same terms as enlisted men, payable at such periods and under such regulations and at such times as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, and bearing interest at 3 per cent per annum.

So as to make the clause read:

For interest on soldiers' deposits, $100,000, and so much as may be necessary to pay back such deposits: Provided, That officers of the Army shall have the right etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 5, after the word "officers," to insert "and contract surgeons;" so as to make the clause read:

For mileage to officers and contract surgeons, when authorized by law, $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 18, before the word "officers," to insert "commissioned;" so as to make the clause read:

For additional 10 per cent increase on pay of commissioned officers serving at foreign stations, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 21, to increase the appropriation for pay of one computer for artillery board from $2,000 to $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, after line 21, to insert:

For cost of repairing injuries by reason of mortar practice at Fort H. G. Wright, N. Y., on August 23, 1902, to dwelling house of E. M. Ferguson, situated on Fishers Island, New York, $25.

Mr. HALE. I am called from the Chamber, and I offer an amendment to this amendment now. It will be in order, because it is an amendment to an amendment. It is precisely such a case as is covered by the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 2, on page 22, insert:

In payment of damages to private property by gun firing and mortar practice at Fort Preble, Me., Winthrop, Mass., and Fort Hamilton, N. Y., as reported to Congress in House Document No. 588, first session Fifty-seventh Congress, $3,806.72.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Philippine Scouts," on page 23, to strike out from line 4 to line 20, inclusive, in the following words:

That section 37 of the act of February 2, 1901, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," is hereby repealed, and the Secretary of War is directed to muster out the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry of the United States service on or before July 1, 1903: Provided, That the officers and enlisted men of the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry shall, upon being mustered out, be paid two months' extra pay, to be paid out of the appropriation for pay of the Army: Provided further, That officers of the Regular Army serving with the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry when mustered out of said regiment shall return to their lineal rank in the Regular Army, and shall be paid for service with said regiment only for time actually in such service: Provided further, That citizens of the island of Porto Rico shall be eligible to enlistment in the Regular Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 20, to insert:

For Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry, composed of 2 battalions of 4 companies each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 22, to insert:

Pay of officers of the line, $54,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 24, to insert:

Pay of enlisted men, $143,676: Provided, That citizens of Porto Rico shall be eligible for enlistment in the Regular Army and the Porto Rico Regiment may be ordered for service out of the island of Porto Rico.

Mr. McCOMAS. I heartily favor the proposition to continue the enlistment of Porto Ricans and to order the Porto Rico Regiment out of the island of Porto Rico for service, but is this intended to be outside of the island of Porto Rico?

Mr. PROCTOR. It is.

Mr. McCOMAS. Then why not say outside of the island?

Mr. PROCTOR. There is no objection to that.

Mr. McCOMAS. If it is for outside service, we might as well say so.

Mr. PROCTOR. There is no objection to that amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland moves, after the word "service," to strike out the word "out" and to insert the word "outside."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 5, after the word "appropriated," to insert "for pay of the Army and miscellaneous;" so as to make the clause read:

All the money hereinbefore appropriated for pay of the Army and miscellaneous shall be disbursed and accounted for by the Pay Department as pay of the Army, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Subsistence Department," on page 26, line 21, after the word "men," to insert "at such places as the Secretary of War may determine;" so as to read:

And for ice to organizations of enlisted men at such places as the Secretary of War may determine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Quartermaster's Department," on page 28, line 3, to increase the appropriation for the purchase of regular supplies of the Quartermaster's Department from $5,000,000 to $5,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 23, to insert:

For the purchase of the necessary instruments, office furniture, stationery, and other authorized articles required for the equipment and use of the officers' schools at the several military posts, $25,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 6, on page 31.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes obligatory upon the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, the pending order, if there is no objection, may be temporarily laid aside in order that the Army appropriation bill may be proceeded with, the order being without prejudice to the unfinished business.

Mr. NELSON. I did not catch the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent is asked that the regular order be temporarily laid aside that the Senate may finish the consideration of the pending appropriation bill.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request. It is so ordered.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 31, line 19, after the words "Secretary of War," to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That when a mounted officer of the line is ordered to duty beyond the seas or to make a change of station in the United States in which the cost of transportation for the private horses which he is required to keep exceeds the sum allowed for that purpose in the Army Regulations, the Secretary of War is authorized, under such regulations in respect to inspection and valuation as he may prescribe, to permit the purchase of said horses by the Quartermaster's Department at a price not exceeding the average contract price paid for horses during the preceding fiscal year, from which sum shall be deducted one-seventh of such contract price for each year, or major fraction of a year, which may have elapsed since date of purchase by said officer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. As I will not be able to remain in the Chamber during the balance of the reading of the bill, I desire to ask of the Senator in charge of the bill about two provisions in it.

First, I wish to say that a year or two ago there was a provision enacted prohibiting the use of the canteen in the Army. I desire to know whether there is anything interfering with the action taken at that time. In other words, is it proposed to legislate the canteen back into the service?

Mr. PROCTOR. There is nothing of the kind in the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I am glad to know that.

The other question is whether there is any provision in the bill giving any kind of promotion to chaplains in the Army. I have had a good many letters from people on that subject, expressing a desire that some such legislation should be had.

Mr. PROCTOR. There is no such provision in the bill. It was considered by the committee, but on the whole it was not deemed advisable to insert it in this bill.

Mr. CULLOM. That answers my question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, under the subhead "Engineer department," on page 43, line 6, after the word "by," to strike out "competent authority" and insert "the Chief of Engineers;" so as to read:

For unforeseen expenses, for travel expenses of officers on journeys approved by the Chief of Engineers and made for the purpose of instruction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Ordnance Department," on page 45, line 8, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That for the purpose of furnishing a national trophy and medals and other prizes to be provided and contested for annually, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, said contest to be open to the Army, and the National Guard or organized militia of the several States, Territories, and of the District of Columbia, and for the cost of the trophy, prizes, and medals herein provided for, the sum of $2,500 be, and the same is hereby, annually appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended for the purposes hereinbefore prescribed under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 24, after the word "dollars," to insert "but every such purchase shall be immediately reported to the Secretary of War;" so as to read:

And hereafter purchases of ordnance and ordnance stores and supplies may be made by the Ordnance Department in open market, in the manner common among business men, when the aggregate of the amount required does not exceed $200, but every such purchase shall be immediately reported to the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 7, after the word "service," to insert "to the grade of first lieutenant;" in line 9, after the word "February," to strike out "first" and insert "second;" in line 10, after the word "grade," to strike out "in which the vacancy exists, or from the grade below," and insert "of first or second lieutenant, and officers so detailed shall, while so serving, receive the pay of first lietenant;" so as to make the clause read:

And hereafter details for service to the grade of first lieutenant in the Ordnance Department under the provisions of the act of February 2, 1901, may be made, from the Army at large, from the grade of first or second lieutenant, and officers so detailed shall, while so serving, receive the pay of first lieutenant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 14, after the word "upon," to strike out:

The recommendation of a board of officers serving in the Ordnance Department, senior to the eligible grade, and after at least one examination, which shall be opened to competition: And provided further, That officers so detailed for service in the Ordnance Department in grades below that of lieutenant-colonel shall not be again eligible for such detail until after they shall have served for at least one year out of that department.

And insert:

Such examination as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

So as to make the clause read:

Provided, That no officer shall be so detailed except upon such examination as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move, on page 16, line 14, after the word "President," to strike out the words "or the Secretary of War."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 14, after the word "President," it is proposed to strike out "or the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. On page 18, line 10, after the word "April," I move to strike out "ninth" and insert "fifteenth," so as to read: "before April 15, 1865."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORAKER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted on page 14, after line 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, after the word "Army," at the end of line 15, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an officer of the Signal Corps as chief of the telegraph and cipher bureau of the Executive Office, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a major.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask that it may be inserted on page 45, at the conclusion of line 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words, "Secretary of War," at the end of line 19, on page 45, it is proposed to insert a colon, and the following:

Provided further, That for the purpose of furnishing the necessary articles requisite to fully arm, equip, and supply each regiment, battalion, squadron, company, troop, battery, signal, engineer and hospital corps and medical department of the organized militia of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia with the same armament and equipment as are now prescribed for corresponding branches of the line or staff in the Regular Army, without cost to said States, Territories, or the District of Columbia, but to remain the property of the United States, and to be accounted for in the manner now prescribed by law, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, on the requisitions of the governors of the several States and Territories, or the commanding general of the militia of the District of Columbia, to issue the said armament and equipment to the organized militia; and the sum of $2,000,000 is hereby appropriated and made immediately available until expended for the procurement and issue of the articles constituting the same.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire briefly to say that that amendment is in direct line with the bill which we have passed reorganizing the militia, and that the appropriation is necessary in order that that bill may be made effective.

I will state, further, that I have conferred with the War Department, and that the amount mentioned in the amendment is deemed the proper amount to carry out that purpose.

Mr. PROCTOR. There is no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendments to the bill as in Committee of the Whole, it will be reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, there have been and will be some other amendments proposed to this bill. The gentlemen who desire that they should be offered were here this morning and inquired whether this bill would be voted upon to-day. I replied that I could not tell them, but that I would ask that it be laid over until to-morrow morning before a vote should be taken. I should like very much, for their accommodation, that that should be done. The bill was only taken up this morning, and it is a very important bill.

Mr. PROCTOR. I hope the Senator will not insist upon that. His friends who thought that there was something in the measure which they wanted amended have, I think, become satisfied that there is nothing in it relating to them, and I am sure the Senator can satisfy them.

Mr. PETTUS. But they want something in the bill, Mr. President, if I may say so, that will relate to them. That is the purpose of my request.

Mr. PROCTOR. And that would be in the nature of legislation, perhaps. I think there is nothing coming properly within the scope of an appropriation bill but what has been included in the bill. I hope the Senator will not ask for a postponement.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to offer an amendment to come in on page 18 of the bill, which I hope the chairman of the committee will accept. On page 18, line 15, after the date "1898," I move to strike out down to and including the word "retirement," in line 21, and insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment as it has been amended, on page 18, line 15, after the date "1898," by striking out the remainder of the paragraph, as follows:

But shall not apply to any officer whose service on the active list does not exceed thirty-five years, and shall not apply to any officer who has been placed on the retired list by virtue of any special act of Congress, nor to any officer who has already received an advance of grade at the time of retirement, or with a view to retirement.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

And all those now on the retired list, without regard to length of service, who served with credit as officers or as enlisted men in the regular or volunteer forces during the civil war prior to April 15, 1865, otherwise than as a cadet, and whose names are borne on the Official Register of the Army, and who have heretofore been retired on account of wounds received or disability incurred in the line of duty, or on account of age, or who have received the Congressional medal of honor, but shall not apply to any officer who has been placed on the retired list by virtue of any special act of Congress, nor to any officer who has already received an advance of grade at the time of retirement, or with a view to retirement: Provided, That in conferring the promotions authorized by this act the grades of first and second lieutenants shall be held to be one and the same grade.

Mr. PROCTOR. There is no objection to that amendment, Mr. President.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. On page 4, line 20, after the word "dollars," I move to insert "to be immediately available." This refers to the provision for the printing of the Historical Register of the United States Army, for which $3,000 is appropriated, and the manuscript is already in hand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 14, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert "to be immediately available."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If no further amendment be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. PETTUS. I made a request which I will now put in the form of a motion. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the further consideration of the bill, which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, be postponed until to-morrow morning.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator name the time to-morrow morning to take the vote?

Mr. PETTUS. Immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. PROCTOR. I prefer that an hour should be named—say 1 o'clock.

Mr. PETTUS. One o'clock will do me just as well as any other time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, Tuesday, at 1 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

DISTRICT TAX SALES AND TAXES.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], being interested in the unfinished business, has consented that I may ask that it be temporarily laid aside to permit me to ask for the present consideration of Senate bill 6421.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of a bill which will be read in full for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 6421) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act relating to tax sales and taxes in the District of Columbia,'" approved May 13, 1892, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act relating to tax sales and taxes in the District of Columbia,'" approved May 13, 1892, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That it shall be the duty of the assessor for the District of Columbia to prepare and keep in his office for public inspection a list of all real estate in the District of Columbia heretofore sold, or which may hereafter be sold, for the nonpayment of any general or special tax or assessment levied or assessed upon the same, including assessments in condemnation cases, said list to show the date of sale and for what tax or assessment sold, in whose name assessed at the time of sale, the amount for which the same was sold, when and to whom conveyed, if deeded, or, if redeemed from said sale, the date of redemption.

"SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the assessor, whenever called upon, to furnish, in addition to the regular tax bills for any piece or parcel of real estate in the District of Columbia, a certified statement, over his hand and official seal, of all taxes and assessments, general and special, that may be due and unpaid at the time of making said certificate, or that all taxes have been paid to the day of issuance thereof; and for each and every certificate so furnished by said assessor the party requesting the same shall pay to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia a fee of $1; and said certificate when furnished shall be a bar to the collection and recovery of any tax or assessment omitted from and which may be a lien upon the real estate mentioned in said certificate, and the assessor is hereby authorized and directed to cancel upon the records of his office any such tax sale, tax, or assessment so omitted from said certificate.

"SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with any of the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I now ask for the regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. BARD. Mr. President, in consequence of the interruption in my remarks I am compelled to recall to the attention of the Senate that in my preceding observations, when referring to the tabulated statement showing the annual assessment valuation of property in Arizona and New Mexico for twenty years and commenting upon the fact that the governors of Arizona had repeatedly claimed that assessments were entirely too low, I said that even were the valuations unfair, they were unfair during the whole period and that nevertheless the assessment rolls served my purpose of determining the rate of progress which the Territory had made in developing its resources and in the accumulation of wealth.

The same practice by assessors of disregarding the provisions of the law requiring that all property shall be assessed at its cash value obtains in California, too, and the assessments of every class of property, except moneys, mortgages, and solvent credits, are low, ranging from 40 to 70 per cent of the true cash or marketable value.

I have reason to believe that this system of low assessments prevails in two of the southeasterly counties of California, San Diego and San Bernardino, which have the Colorado River as their common boundary with Arizona.

These two counties have a population of 63,019, or about one-half the population of Arizona.

San Bernardino County is the largest subdivision of California, its area being nearly 20,000 square miles. But the greater portion of both counties consists of mountain and desert lands.

Their resources are similar to those of Arizona. There are mines of gold and silver, and deposits of copper, iron, soda, and salt. As in Arizona, some portions of the lands are occupied by orchards of orange and lemon, walnuts, olive, and deciduous fruits. Some portions are farmed in barley, wheat, and alfalfa, and sugar beets. Dairying is an important industry in some localities. There are but few manufactures.

As in Arizona, horticulture and agriculture in these two counties of California are dependent upon irrigation, and, as in Arizona, all the available water in these counties, except that which may be supplied by the Colorado River, subterranean sources, or by storage systems, has already been utilized.

There seems, therefore, an appropriateness in using the developed agricultural resources and aggregate wealth of these two neighboring counties in California as standards, which may readily be comprehended, for measuring the importance and extent of the agriculture and aggregate wealth of Arizona.

Taking the data from the census for 1900, I find that Arizona has 5,809 farms, aggregating an area of 1,935,327 acres. These two counties in California have 5,048 farms, aggregating 1,028,551 acres. Arizona has 4,464 improved farms, aggregating an area of 254,521 acres. These two counties in California have 4,544 improved farms, aggregating 326,711 acres, or over 72,000 acres more than Arizona and about the same area in improved farms as has New Mexico.

The value of land and improvements, buildings, implements, and machinery in Arizona is $14,448,160; in New Mexico it is $22,040,424; in Arizona and New Mexico together it is $36,488,584; in the two counties of California it is $40,827,517 or nearly three times as much as in Arizona and over $4,000,000 more than in Arizona and New Mexico together.

According to their assessment rolls these two counties together have assessable property valued at $39,029,537, which is almost exactly equal to the assessed valuation of all property of every kind in the whole Territory of Arizona and over $1,000,000 more than the assessed valuation of all property in New Mexico in 1902.

So far as I am informed there is no movement on the part of the people of these two counties to be separated from the other fifty-five counties in California, and to ask Congress to be admitted as a new State, and yet in respect to the possession of accumulated wealth which contributes to the expense of the Government, they are better qualified for statehood than is Arizona or New Mexico under present conditions.

Further pursuing my plan to investigate the reports of the governors of Arizona for the last twenty years, with the view of determining what has been the rate of progress that has been made in the development of the resources of the Territory, I will now take up the subject of agriculture.

To determine what progress has been made in agriculture during the period mentioned we must first determine to what extent the arable lands were used in 1883 and what were the conditions affecting or relating to agriculture at or about that time, and then compare them with the areas of land now under cultivation and the general conditions which prevail.

Fortunately, in the report of Governor F. A. Tritle to the Secretary of the Interior, dated September 30, 1883, we have a very good description of the general conditions of the resources of the Territory at that time. I will not quote his remarks at length, but will summarize, as follows:

He says that the grand resources which so long had remained dormant are at last being understood and appreciated, and that possessing these three great resources of wealth—mining, agriculture, and grazing—Arizona is destined to be the home of a large population, and there are few new countries which are blessed with so many sources of permanent prosperity or which have so bright a future. He refers to the fact that while the progress of the civilization of the Territory and the development of its resources had been interfered with by most serious difficulties, those conditions had been changed, and that during the preceding two years exceptional development had been made in all the several industries, and that the affairs of the Territory are in an exceedingly prosperous condition.

This statement will indicate that it is quite fair to begin our investigations at this turning point in the history of Arizona.

It was recognized by Governor Tritle in 1883, as it is now conceded by Governor Murphy, that "irrigation is necessary to raise a crop in Arizona, and very little is produced without it."

Governor Tritle estimates that in 1883 there were between 60,000 and 70,000 acres under cultivation, 30,000 acres of which are under cultivation along the Salt River, and it is estimated that the 60,000 inches in Salt River at its lowest stage will afford water enough to cultivate 120,000 acres, or more than four times the area then being made productive.

He states also that Arizona was then (in 1883) "in possession of two transcontinental railroads and over 1,000 miles of telegraph lines, and that with the completion of certain other railroad lines then projected the Territory will enter a career of prosperity that will astonish the most sanguine believer in its marvelous wealth and brilliant future."

Governor Tritle, in his annual report to the Secretary of the Interior for 1884, again says "the development of the wealth embraced in mining, grazing, and agriculture has shown marked advancement, and there has been absolute freedom from the depredations of hostile savages. There are now in the Territory about 300,000 head of cattle, and there is probably good pasturage, under present conditions, for 1,000,000 more. There are now in the valleys of the Salt and Gila rivers 400,000 acres which can be brought under cultivation, although less than 50,000 acres are now being made productive, 35,000 acres being in Salt River Valley, and an immense canal is being constructed which will convey water enough to reclaim at least 100,000 acres."

In the report for 1885 the information for which we seek is more specific. It states that the total number of acres under cultivation is 97,000, and that of the 2,000,000 acres of arable land which the Territory is estimated to contain it is believed there is living water under present conditions sufficient to reclaim 700,000 acres, of which at least 600,000 acres are found in the valleys of the Salt and Gila rivers, not more than one-eighth of which is yet under cultivation.

The governor again repeats that as nothing can be raised without irrigation, it follows that Arizona's productive capacity as a farming region depends entirely upon the available water supply; that 60,000, square miles (about 38,000,000 acres), or more than half the entire area of the Territory, can be utilized for grazing purposes; that the number of cattle assessed that year was 435,000, but that 50 per cent of the cattle were not assessed. He therefore estimates the number of cattle in the Territory at that time to be 652,500, and that nearly all of the cattle are pastured upon about 13,000,000 acres tributary to natural springs and streams. Besides, there are in the Territory 900,000 sheep.

To compare these data with the conditions now existing, as disclosed by the census of 1900 and the reports of the governor for the last two years, we find that in 1901 Governor Murphy states that "the problem of water storage for irrigation is the most interesting question before the people of Arizona, and all are agreed that upon the storage of flood waters depends the future development of agriculture in the Territory," and that "while there are millions of acres of Government land open to entry, there is hardly an additional acre that is available until the water supply is increased through storage;" and he is compelled to reply to inquiries as to the opportunities for settlers in Arizona on the public lands, that "practically speaking all of the land for which there is water available at present has been acquired by settlers, and the only opening for other agriculturists is to buy land already tilled," and "that capital had been led into the construction of canals for which the water, normally, is not sufficient, and under these canals settlers have acquired lands from the Government and have gone ahead cultivating and improving their possessions so far as possible, although in many instances the land lies uncultivated year after year simply because there is not water for it."

He says this is illustrative of the conditions in Maricopa County, the principal agricultural county of Arizona, and that the area of the land settled upon in Maricopa County under the various canals will aggregate 300,000 acres, while the land actually irrigated each year will not probably amount to more than 130,000 acres, and for much of this area there is, throughout a long season each year, an insufficient volume of water in the ditches.

Evidently having the census tables for 1900 before him, Governor Murphy, in his report for 1901 (Annual Reports, Department of the Interior for 1901, Miscellaneous Reports, part II, p. 117), gives us the following specific information, which enables us to make the desired comparisons:

In 1900 there were 1,935,327 acres included in farms, of which only 254,521 acres are improved. Of the improved land, 227,890 acres are outside of Indian reservations and 26,631 acres are within Indian reservations; and of the 227,890 acres of improved land, 81.4 per cent, or 185,396 acres, is irrigated land, and of this 974 acres are irrigated wholly or in part by pumping or artesian wells.

Now, by comparing this data with that taken from the reports for 1883, 1884, and 1885, we ascertain that of the 2,000,000 acres of arable land estimated to be contained in the Territory by Governor Tritle in his report for 1885, 1,935,327, or approximately all of it, is now included in farms; and that of the 700,000 acres estimated in 1885 to be susceptible of irrigation, only 254,521 acres are included in the aggregate area in farms in 1900; that the area of the lands in cultivation, which was estimated by the governor to be in 1883 between 60,000 and 70,000 acres, and in 1885 to be 97,000 acres, has increased to 254,521 acres, a gain of about 189,000 acres since 1883, and of 157,000 acres since 1885.

It will also appear, according to Governor Murphy's report, that the area of the irrigated land outside of Indian reservations increased from 65,821 acres in 1890 to 185,396 in 1900, a gain of 119,575 acres; and according to his statement there can not be, under present conditions, any further increase of the area of irrigated land in the Territory until the water supply is increased through storage.

Of the area of irrigated land (185,396 acres), about 130,000 acres are in Maricopa County, supplied with water from the Salt and Gila rivers, and this is a gain of about 65,000 acres over the area reported in 1883 to be under cultivation.

We find from tables in this report for 1901 (p. 127) that the canals which furnish these acres of land in Maricopa County with water from the Salt and Gila rivers, and first used in 1886 and up to 1890, aggregate about 391 miles in length and cost over $1,877,000, or about $14 per acre.

The report (p. 117) also contains the statement that within the ten years from 1890 to 1900, 545 miles of canals and ditches were constructed at a cost of $1,508,469, and that by the opening of these new ditches and canals between 1890 and 1900, 26,297 acres were added to the irrigated area. This would indicate a cost for canal systems of $3,385,467, or $26 per acre for the original cost of works to supply water to 130,000 acres actually irrigated now, and that the cost for supplying the additional area alone was about $57 per acre.

Governor Murphy, again referring to the census statistics, says, that on the farms making use of irrigation the average value of products not fed to live stock is $7 per acre.

Closely related to agriculture is the third important industry in Arizona, namely, range grazing, which I purpose to discuss, with the view of determining what has been its growth.

I pursue again my comparisons of the conditions of the industry in the early part of our period of twenty years with its present condition.

The opening of the two transcontinental railroads across the Territory in 1881 gave a great impetus to the introduction of cattle on ranges, and in the years 1883 and 1884 every running stream and permanent spring was settled upon, and the adjacent ranges were stocked with cattle brought in from the adjoining States of Mexico, from other Territories, and from the States.

Governor Tritle, in 1885, estimated that there were then in the Territory 652,500 head of cattle, but he arrives at this result by adding 50 per cent to the number assessed, 435,000. He estimates that more than one-half of the whole Territory, or 36,000,000 acres, can be utilized for grazing purposes. But not more than one-third of this immense range is supplied with living water. Consequently we will understand that about 13,000,000 acres were considered available.

And he says, again, that nearly all the cattle in the Territory—namely, 652,500 head—are pastured upon about 13,000,000 acres tributary to natural springs and streams.

In 1891 (vol. 14, Governor McCord) the ranges were throughout the Territory conceded to be stocked nearly to the full capacity. Governor McCord says the assessment roll of cattle for 1891 shows 720,941 head of cattle, but that nevertheless men whose judgment is not at fault on these matters are positive that after the calf branding of 1891, and before the sale of steers in the fall of that year, there were, in round numbers, 1,500,000 cattle in Arizona.

In 1892 there was a great drought, and the cattlemen realized that the ranges were overstocked, and they were forced to move their stock out of the country. The losses are conceded to be no less than 50 per cent, and some insist that 75 per cent is not too geat an estimate. This bitter experience that Arizona stockmen underwent in 1892 and 1893 compelled them to realize that there is a limitation to the quantity of cattle that may be pastured in the Territory, beyond which it is unwise to go; and the motto, "Fewer stock and better," indicates the generally accepted plan for carrying on the industry.

At the same time, the governor expresses the opinion that the sheep owners in some localities of northern Arizona have approached dangerously near the line of safety, not for want of grass, but of water, and that this may in a measure be remedied by building tanks and conserving the waters that now run to waste.

It is evident from these statements that the grazing on the ranges of Arizona has also nearly, if not quite, reached its maximum limit under present conditions. It is understood that the business has generally been remunerative, and therefore, in these days of rare opportunities for investment, it is probable that the stock industry of Arizona is prosecuted to its reasonable legitimate limit.

Now, relying upon the estimate made by Governor Tritle, that the number of cattle in the Territory in 1885 was 652,500, and comparing it with the 924,761 head of neat cattle in the Territory in 1899, as shown by the census returns, which includes 135,181 calves under 1 year old, we find that in the fifteen years there would appear to be an increase of 90,135 head. But that comparison is most liberal, and hardly justifiable. We have compared statistics derived from one source in 1885 with statistics derived from another source in 1900.

A more reliable comparison is made by taking only the assessment rolls or the census reports for our basis of calculation. And if we rely wholly upon the census we find (in Table CLVI) that the number of neat cattle, exclusive of calves, in Arizona, expressed in thousands, was, in 1880, 136,000; in 1890, 928,000; in 1900, 607,000, and that the percentage of decrease in the last decade was 34.5 per cent, or 321,000 head.

Grazing is certainly a very important industry for Arizona, but until some effective means shall be found to supply with water and thus make available for pasturage the rest of its large area of land there would seem to be no possibility of its further growth.

Many of the most valuable grasses are annuals. Drastic feeding on them year after year leaves too little seed for renewal, and finally none at all. Too close grazing in time destroys any perennial grass. It is killed by trampling, and during long droughts cattle pull it up by the roots.

In the regions where plenty of rainfall exists, the pasturage is longer lived and less liable to permanent injury by overgrazing, but in an arid region like Arizona there is great danger that overstocking will permanently injure large parts of its grazing area, and if the land which is made no longer valuable for grazing purposes can not be utilized for agriculture without irrigation, it will, of course, become worthless for any purpose. When the pasture becomes too poor for cattle, sheep are brought in, and though they are able to roam farther away and to live where cattle would die, they soon complete the destruction by close feeding and trampling of the loose soil in the areas nearest the watering places.

That sheep are displacing the cattle on the ranges in Arizona is indicated by the census returns (Table VI, Vol. V, Agriculture), which give the number of sheep in Arizona in 1870 as 803, in 1880 as 466,524, in 1890 as 515,136, in 1900 as 668,458.

Pursuing the same method of ascertaining the growth in the development of the resources of Arizona, I will now compare its productions of precious metals in 1883 with that of 1902, and I ask leave to print a table showing the value of Arizona's production of precious metals for the past twenty years which I have collated from the reports of the Director of the Mint.

Table showing the value of Arizona's production of precious metals, prepared from reports of the Director of the Mint.

a Coin value.

This table will show that in 1883 the production of gold was $950,000 and the production of silver was $5,200,000, or altogether $6,150,000, and that in 1902 the production of gold had increased to about $4,000,000, but that the value of the silver produced had fallen off to about $4,000,000, so that the total production for 1902 as compared with 1883 shows an increase for the twenty years of $2,103,000. However, the production of 1882 was much greater than that of 1883, and compared with that of 1902 there has been a decrease in the production amounting to $300,000 in the twenty-one years since 1882.

The aggregate value of the production of gold and silver shows marked fluctuations during the twenty years, the total product decreasing during the decade following 1882 until in 1892 it had fallen off to two million and a half of dollars. It recovered somewhat during the years next succeeding, but in 1898 it fell off again to a little more than two and a half million dollars. At no time between 1883 and 1902 has the total production of gold and silver been as much as it was in 1883.

I have another tabulated statement showing the total copper production of Arizona from 1882 to 1901, inclusive (the figures for 1902 not being obtainable), covering a period of twenty years, which I have obtained through the courtesy of the Geological Survey; and I ask that it be inserted in my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). If there be no objection, the table will be inserted in the RECORD.

The table referred to is as follows:

Total copper production in Arizona from 1882 to 1901, inclusive.

	Pounds.		Pounds.
1882	17,984,415	1893	43,902,824

Mr. BARD. The production of copper in Arizona in 1882 was, roughly, 18,000,000 pounds, since which time it has constantly increased without much variation—although in 1886 and 1887 it dropped below that point—until in 1899 the copper production reached the highest point of about 133,000,000 pounds; in 1900 it fell off to 118,000,000 pounds; and in 1901 it recovered to 130,000,000 pounds.

The valuation of the copper product for 1901 at 10 cents per pound would be about $13,077,861, which, added to the aggregate gold and silver production, would make the aggregate value of these three productions about $21,000,000.

We find, upon examining the assessed valuations of property taxed in Arizona, that 1,376 patented mines and improvements on mines are assessed at the aggregate valuation of only $6,303,394, or about one-sixth of the aggregate amount of assessed property in the Territory; which suggests that the common practice of placing low valuations upon mines, or letting some of them go untaxed entirely, prevails in Arizona as well as in many of the other States and Territories.

Town and city lots and improvements alone are assessed at $9,859,525.12 or 50 per cent more than are the mines and improvements, and according to the assessment roll constitute more than one-quarter of all the tax-bearing property in the Territory.

The governors of the Territory have repeatedly called attention to the injustice of allowing the mine owners to evade bearing their just proportion of the taxes, and in his report for 1900 Governor Murphy repeats his very earnest appeal to the legislative assembly for legislative enactment giving to the board of equalization the power to assess mines and to equalize the values of mining property. He says, in reference to this evasion of taxes by mine owners: It is "wrong, and in no way can the proposition be defended, that great riches in gold, copper, and silver dug from Arizona ground and distributed as dividends in the East and in Europe should not be taxed in some form in the Territory."

There has always been in the mining States and Territories a strong opposition on the part of the population against taxing mining property. This opposition is founded upon the idea that it is impracticable to ascertain even approximately the value of ores that are yet hidden in the rocks, and to assess the bullion, or the net proceeds of the mines, would subject the mine owners to inquiry and investigation that would be prejudicial to their interests. This objection is a tradition or principle coming down from a former generation, and is so firmly fixed in the minds of the people that we need not be surprised when we are told by Governor Murphy that his earnest appeal "resulted in no new legislation on the subject," and in all probability the same system of taxation, which relieves the mines of a great part of their fair share of taxes, will be continued in Arizona for many years to come, whether it has statehood or not.

The history of mining shows many fluctuations. The great mines are often temporarily or permanently abandoned because of circumstances which tend to reduce the values of the output or to enlarge the cost of mining beyond the point where the business remains remunerative.

A case in point is mentioned in the report of the governor of Arizona, where the Mammoth Mine, in Pinal County, for a long time a great producer, has been worked down to the water level, and is closed for the present, pending a reorganization, preparatory to drainage and deeper working.

Then, again, improved methods of mining or treatment of the ores may give renewed impetus to the industry, as in the case of the mines in the Tombstone district, which have been lying practically dormant for over twenty years, but which are now being resuscitated. The great silver camps in Utah, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and Nevada have at times been compelled to cease operations, partially or completely, as a result of the depression in the price of silver. We have seen from the comparison that I have made of the history of the production of gold and silver in Arizona, that the industries are subject to the same mutations and uncertainties that prevail elsewhere. At present the copper mines of Arizona are in a prosperous condition, and no one can predict to what immense dimensions the production may go, nor can anyone say how soon there may be a turn which will make them of less importance.

I do not wish to put particular significance upon the figures, but it will be observed from the table of copper production that there has been a falling off in the production of copper in Arizona since 1899.

As I have shown, the governors of Arizona have repeatedly admitted that both the agricultural and grazing resources of the Territory have reached their limit under present conditions of water supply, and this limitation is an important factor in determining whether Arizona will be able to attract and retain a permanent population whose numbers will have a reasonable ratio with the population of the rest of the country.

The soil is more constant and reliable than the mines as a resource. Upon the soil communities must in general, directly or indirectly, depend for their prosperity and growth. Upon it ordinarily depends the power of any community to maintain its population. Manufacturing interests grow where agriculture thrives. It is true that the soil of Arizona is exceedingly fertile wherever it can be reclaimed and watered. Professor Hilgard, of the University of California, a very high authority on such subjects, has declared that the extraordinary fertility which marks the valley of the Nile is a quality inherent in aridity itself.

The valuable ingredients of the soil, which are soluble and in our humid regions are washed out and carried by the streams into the ocean, have been accumulating in the arid soil of the West for centuries, and wherever water in sufficient quantities can be obtained to utilize them on the land they will contribute more to the welfare and maintenance of future generations than all the wealth which may be yielded from all the existing mines.

Professor Hilgard's conclusions are the result of patient investigation, and are based on over a thousand analyses of the soils of the arid and humid regions of the United States. They demonstrate that the soils of the arid regions, when compared with the soils of the region east of the Mississippi River, contain on an average three times as much potash, six times as much magnesia, and fourteen times as much lime, and he declares that arid countries are always rich countries when irrigated. Nearly all of the rivers of the West are torrential and carry more or less rich silt, which if arrested and diverted by dams and canals will serve to keep the soil interminably enriched.

It is estimated from observation by the scientific men of the University of Arizona that this fertilizing material in Arizona soils would cost, if purchased in the markets, over $9 per acre.

The only possible solution of supplying additional water for irrigation purposes in Arizona is the construction of great reservoir systems near the sources of the streams or the diversion of water from the Colorado. Opportunities offered by nature for such storage works can not be utilized under present conditions, because of the large cost involved and the difficulties to deal with vested rights in existing works, and in appropriated water, and to distribute the cost among the settlers proportionately.

Congress has, however, recently recognized the importance of the reclamation of the arid lands and the duty and necessity of Government to assist in the work of reclamation by devoting the proceeds of all future sales of its public land in the arid States and Territories for such purpose, in order to make them habitable and available for the surplus people. Such appropriation will be inadequate for providing more than a fair beginning on a reasonable scale of the immense enterprise of reclaiming the great arid West.

Much time will be required for the Government to evolve its plans for reclamation of the arid wastes, for it is a novel and untried policy and involves many intricate legal questions and engineering and scientific problems.

In view of the varying laws and regulations in the several arid States in respect to appropriation and riparian rights and the control and distribution of waters, it is probable that the Government will find it most expedient to initiate its policy of reclamation of the arid lands by applying the reclamation fund first to the development of some of its projects for dams and storage reservoirs in the Territories.

It therefore seems to me that there are several good reasons why this reclamation fund should be applied to carrying forward, if found practicable and judicious, one or more of the projects for developing the water supply in Arizona which have been discussed for many years. Among them is the San Carlos dam on the Gila River, in which the Government is directly interested, for it would supply water to the Indians of the San Carlos Indian Reservation, who are in a measure dependent upon aid from the Government, and who if supplied with water, would be able to support themselves. The dam would also supply water for the reclamation and irrigation of a considerable area of the public domain in the vicinity.

Another important project is the Tonto Basin Reservoir, which is designed to regulate the supply and overcome the periodical shortage of water in the Salt River Valley—the glory of Arizona. It is an ambitious scheme, and, if constructed, it will have an important bearing on the further development and future welfare of a country already settled and prepared to utilize the additional water which may be conserved by the proposed works.

It, however, raises the serious question whether the Government may, under the irrigation bill, properly use the reclamation fund for supplying water to lands held almost entirely in private ownership.

It is gratifying to know that the Geological Survey has now a force in Arizona, in charge of the Chief of the Division of Hydrography, Hon. F. H. Newell, engaged in making accurate surveys with the view of determining the possibilities of the various projects for the storing of water which have been discussed for some time, and of selecting one or more of the most available and valuable sites for the initiation of the national irrigation movement in that region.

These remarks have far exceeded the limit that I had set, and I will close them with the simple declaration that, in view of the facts which I have presented relative to her condition, it seems clear to me that Arizona is not yet fully qualified for statehood, and that her admission as a State would not afford her better opportunities for improvement in her conditions, nor will the refusal to admit her have the effect of retarding or interfering with the development of her resources.

The conditions in New Mexico, which I have not attempted to describe, but which have been presented in the report of the committee, and in the able remarks of the other members of the committee who have preceded me in this discussion, are also such that, in justice to the whole country, I am unable to vote in favor of her admission.

Oklahoma, though fitted in many respects for statehood, ought not to be admitted alone, nor until the Indian Territory is also included in the proposed new State.

If there is room for doubt as to the advisability of admitting these Territories at this time, that doubt should be given in favor of the whole people of the nation rather than to the people of the Territories, and I concur fully with the committee in their caution that if it is a mistake not to admit these Territories at the present time, it is a mistake which can be remedied by any future Congress.

If it is a mistake to admit them, and that mistake is consummated, it never can be undone, for the American people never have permitted, nor will they under any conceivable circumstances ever permit, so long as the Republic continues, one single star to be removed from the field of our flag.

Mr. QUARLES obtained the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield, that I may ask the Senate to take up the motion I made this morning?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the regular business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of taking up a bill.

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection to temporarily laying aside the pending order with the understanding that the bill the Senator from Minnesota proposes to call up will not create any discussion.

Mr. CLAPP. It will not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

CLAIMS OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS, ETC.

Mr. CLAPP. When the bill (S. 3112) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to determine all claims of the confederated bands of Ute Indians of Colorado was recommended last spring, a committee amendment was made which I supposed had been filed with the clerks, but which I found on the passage of the bill on Saturday had not been filed. I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed on Saturday last.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "Congress," in line 4, page 7, down to and including the word "thereof," in line 21, on the same page, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Including any and all claims arising from the use of lands for the occupation of railroads and other public highways or public uses not herein excepted from the jurisdiction conferred by this act, and all demands on the part of the United States and claims against said Indians growing out of treaty obligations and agreements ratified by Congress except judgments of the Court of Claims for depredations committed by said Indians and the capitalized annuity and interest thereon hereinafter provided to be set off against the compensation to said Indians for certain timber and forest reservations; but excluding the claims of said Indians to compensation for lands embraced within the White River Plateau Timber and Land Reserve, set apart to the United States under Executive order and proclamation of the President dated October 16, 1891, and the Battlement Mesa Forest Reserve, set apart to the United States under Executive order and the proclamation of the President December 24, 1892; against the compensation for said reservations which may hereafter be allowed and paid to said Indians there shall be set off the sum of $1,250,000, being an amount of money sufficient at 4 per cent to produce annually $50,000, together with the interest arising on said fund, annually paid to said Indians per capita in cash under the provisions of section 5 of the "Act to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriation for carrying out the same," approved June 15, 1880, which sum and the annuity arising therefrom shall not enter into or form a part of any set-off to be offered by the United States in the action herein provided for; and the Secretary of the Interior shall report to Congress at its next session the acreage and character of the lands embraced within the said reservation, classifying the same as mineral, agricultural, timber, and stone lands, and shall report the estimated value of each class of said lands per acre, and he shall immediately enter into negotiations with said Indians for the purpose of agreeing upon the compensation which shall be paid to them by the United States for said lands, in which negotiations the said Indians may be represented by the attorneys by this act authorized to represent them in the courts, whose compensation shall not exceed 15 per cent of the amount which may be allowed to said Indians after deducting the set-off herein provided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further amendments in the Senate——

Mr. CLAPP. There were certain amendments made to the bill as it passed on Saturday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those amendments have already been agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. That is all right.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. QUARLES. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. This morning I was called for a moment to my committee room from the Chamber, during which time the Senator from Pennsylvania asked that a date be fixed for voting upon the pending measure, and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] objected. The Senator from Pennsylvania, I understand, said that what he was going to do was well understood by the chairman. I simply want to call attention to the fact that of course the Senator did not mean that any inference should be drawn from that that I had in anywise consented in any manner, openly or secretly, to a date being fixed for a vote upon this bill.

I was called, as I explained to the Senator, for a few moments to the committee room. The senior Senator said he was going to make the usual request. In my absence there were a large number of Senators prepared to object—the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], and indeed, a very large number of others, and the usual objection would be made. I simply rose to relieve the Senator of the inference which might have been drawn from his words, for I know he does not wish to be understood as implying that there was any understanding that a vote should be reached at that time, or at any specific date.

Mr. QUAY. Not at all, Mr. President. The understanding of the Senator from Pennsylvania is distinctly to the contrary. What happened was that I mentioned to the Senator from Indiana that I was about to make the request. He said he was obliged to leave the Chamber, and I said that he would find a substitute, or something of that sort.

My remark in relation to the Senator from Indiana was drawn out by what the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] stated in connection with his objection, to wit, that he objected on account of the absence of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was certain that the Senator did not mean that any inference should be drawn from it, and it was for the purpose of giving the Senator himself the opportunity to so state that I rose.

Mr. QUAY. That is all right.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What the Senator has stated as occurring between me and himself is exactly right, of course, except that I asked the Senator whether he was going to do anything that would require my attention, as I was called away for a few moments. He said he was going to make his usual request and he had no doubt several gentlemen on our side would object, and I told him that I thought that would certainly occur.

I have been informed that the Senator remarked, in my momentary absence, that what he was going to do was understood by me; and I wanted to relieve the Senator from having it inferred by anything in his remarks that there was any understanding. I have done that, and therefore accomplished my purpose. I am glad I have done so, because I have afforded the Senator the opportunity to make himself clear on that point.

Mr. QUAY. The Senator from Indiana may rest assured that I will never accuse him of endeavoring to facilitate the passage of this bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But the Senator will admit earnest efforts on the part of the chairman to facilitate debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I desire to say in the first instance that, so far as Arizona and New Mexico are concerned, I bear neither any ill will. On the other hand, I have many friends living in both those Territories, and if it were proper to consult personal preference I should be more than glad to vote in accordance with their wishes. But I do not feel at liberty to consult personal wishes in a case which involves stipulating away the rights of the State that I have the honor, in part, to represent upon this floor. If it shall be the deliberate verdict of Congress that 96,000 people living in Arizona shall be the equivalent of 194,000 people living in my own State; if it shall be held that 96,000 people in Arizona, constituting a little more than 54 per cent of the ratio of representation, shall have not only a Representative in the other House, but shall also be given two Senators, who are to enter this body upon an equal footing, then Wisconsin and every other State represented on this floor will be compelled to yield a pro rata of influence and power to qualify a Territory that is deficient in population.

This we have no right to do. I freely concede that both of these Territories have very many cultivated, highly intelligent people who would be an honor to any civilization and welcomed as useful citizens in any State of the Union. But the trouble is that there are not enough of them. The percentage of illiteracy throughout those Territories is such that the mere numerical test can not possibly be considered alone sufficient.

Mr. President, I have been surprised at some things that have taken place since this bill came to us from the House. I have been taught from my youth to revere the Union, not only as a sentiment represented by its flag, but in every regard as being a sacred combination of States, and that any change in the Union was a matter of vital importance; that when a proposition was advanced to add three States to this Union it should challenge the attention and engage the best thought of both bodies of Congress, upon whom and upon whom alone the Constitution has vested the discretion to admit new States.

Without desiring to speak in the vein of criticism, this bill in another place seems to have received very scant attention; and when it comes here the same indifference seems to prevail, as though it were a subsidiary question. I have thought at times, Mr. President, since this discussion begun, what would be the attitude of this body if, instead of representing States, we represented a great and powerful commercial combination, and the proposition had been to bring in three new partners, who should partake equally of our profits and share with us the responsibility of management?

It has seemed to me that under those circumstances the pending proposition would have awakened the utmost interest. No pains would have been spared in ascertaining who and what those three proposed partners were; what their records had been, not only in a business way, but socially and morally; whether they were so equipped that they could fit into the great company advantageously; whether their temperaments were such that we could work with them; what capital they had; what credit they could command—and at every point where the question touched the welfare of the concern there would have been the most searching investigation before any final conclusion was reached. Why? Because the admission of three partners makes a new combination and a different combination. The firm name might remain the same, but it would be essentially a different concern. There would be three new factors in every question of policy. Mr. President, does anyone doubt that the commercial spirit would have dictated the most exhaustive investigation upon such a question?

In the case of a commercial partnership, with nothing but dollars and cents involved, the whole success or failure of the enterprise would be shown in a balance sheet; and yet here we are a great partnership of uncrowned sovereigns, a great combination of States, upon whose existence and prosperity there is more of destiny hinging than ever depended upon any other combination in this world. Dollars and cents are mere dross as compared with the great public interests that are here involved. Still the fact remains that the admission of three States, like the admission of three partners, makes a new Union, and a different Union.

As my distinguished colleague [Mr. SPOONER] suggested to me a moment since, there is this difference: A partnership can be wound up at any time by the court and its liabilities and assets settled, but here our decision upon this measure must stand forever, absolutaly irrevocable, with no tribunal to which any appeal can ever be taken. Therefore it has seemed to me that this was a measure of the first importance, which calls for the most thorough debate and investigation.

But what do we find, Mr. President, when the measure reaches this House? An announcement is made before the report is printed, before any of the testimony is printed, that "we, the majority, are ready to vote to-day;" and, if I remember aright, the further proposition that "we, the majority, are ready to fight this afternoon if we have got to have a fight at all." That announcement was something novel, I apprehend, in parliamentary usage, and it was as startling as it was novel. The announcement of the will of the majority and the count of the votes ordinarily constitute the last step in parliamentary procedure; but in this case it is made the first. "We, the majority"—and that announcement, sir, is flashed out here before this body with all the suddenness of a wireless message—"we, the majority, ask and demand."

How had that majority been ascertained, Mr. President? No feature of the measure had ever been presented to this body, no discussion had been had, no vote had been taken, yet at the very outset we hear of a predetermined majority. Mr. President, it took nerve and skill; yes, more, it took genius to make the announcement so cogent and masterful as to put every opponent of this measure immediately in a hopeless minority, to put him at a dispiriting disadvantage; and, without phrasing it in words, practically served notice that "we, the majority," having the votes have no need of argument; that he who seeks to discuss this measure will be looked upon as an obstructionist. It was not put in so many words; but by the dramatic manner and assurance with which it was done, it suggested a new precedent in parliamentary usage, resorted to for the purpose of producing a certain effect upon this body, which we have felt thrilling this Chamber from that hour until now.

Who were "we, the majority," and how was it ascertained? By a mass meeting somewhere or by a secret conclave—a caucus in some dark room? That, Mr. President, is and will always remain one of those inscrutable mysteries which attend this novel method of arriving at the will of the majority. While we were wondering who "we, the majority" were, we were in part enlightened by a remark made by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], for whom I entertain a profound respect. You will remember that he said that, "We on this side of the Chamber are not divided, however it may be upon the other;" and in substance he said, as I remember, "Without having polled my confrères, I feel at liberty to say that every one of them is in favor of this measure; we are ready to vote to-day."

It seemed to me, sir, that some great light must have irradiated the other side of the Chamber to produce that sudden and vivid conviction, and I was reminded of the two old worthies in the Bible, each of whom was confronted on the highway by a great light, and I may be pardoned for saying that the present incident suggests Balaam rather than Saul.

Another thing, Mr. President, that is somewhat remarkable. A proposition was made by the committee by way of substitute to change the provisions of this bill. It was promptly announced that a motion to lay on the table would be made if the substitute were presented. What did that mean? Simply that instead of pursuing the usual ordinary methods sanctioned by the practice and traditions of the Senate any proposition to perfect the bill would be stifled by a motion to lay upon the table. Thus we were early admonished that no change in the text of the bill would be permitted. It had reached the stage of perfection under the masterful influence of the majority.

By unanimous consent statehood was made the regular order, and has had the attention, and almost the sole attention, of this body since the 10th day of December. It has also occupied a good part of the morning hour, and thus siege has been laid to this House by the proponents of this measure, who assume that debate is an impertinence and argument an obstruction.

I had occasion the other day to look into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of 1888, where a bill was being considered for the admission of South Dakota, and I could not help but notice the contrast in parliamentary procedure. That case was discussed on both sides by the ablest men in this body; and, if I mistake not, a much longer time was consumed in the discussion than has been taken here; and, instead of having been regarded as a measure which should be put through by the brutal numerical strength of a majority, it was looked upon as a great question worthy of the serious attention of the statesmen who then had seats in this body.

NO POLITICAL ESTOPPEL.

There is another feature of this discussion to which I wish to advert for a moment. It is another peculiar characteristic of the same general nature. We have been repeatedly admonished since this debate began that the question had been practically settled by a political convention. An effort has been made here to enforce a kind of political estoppel upon Senators because, forsooth, some of them were present at a political convention which assumed to pass a resolution in favor of the early admission of these Territories. That has been held in terrorem over the Republican members of this body, and the logic of it is that for a Senator to think is apostasy and to disagree is political heresy. I do not yield even to the distinguished Senator from Ohio in loyalty to the Republican party or to its political tenets, but I do not look upon a political platform as infallible, and I want to deny, on my own behalf, at least, that a political convention is or ought to be the keeper of the Senatorial conscience; neither do I admit that it is the forum where a great measure like this can be safely matured.

What are the proper limitations of a political convention? I apprehend that their powers consist, first, of the right to nominate party candidates, and secondly, to give expression to the political thought that is at that time agitating the mind of the people. The platform ought to be a correct photograph of the intellectual conviction of the people regarding the questions then at issue. If the platform goes beyond that, the convention has transcended its legitimate power; it speaks no longer ex cathedra, but is a mere personal declaration of the gentlemen who happen to have framed the platform.

Statehood is not, and never can be, a political question. It is essentially a legislative question. It involves primarily the exercise of a great legislative discretion. Furthermore, the admission of the three Territories was not an issue at the time when the Republican convention met in Philadelphia. It was not a question in which the people felt present interest; it was not a question upon which they voted; it was not a question that was discussed at all by either party anywhere, so far as I know, or considered as a part of the political creed of either party.

I can not understand any difficulty that any Senator should feel who might have been concerned even in the preparation of that plank in that political convention, when he comes here as a Senator of the United States to pass upon statehood as a legislative question. He is considering it here from an entirely different view. As a politician he considers it as it will affect the interest of a party, while here, as a Senator, he has before him the whole question as it will influence the welfare of 78,000,000 people and 45 States.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], when he was discussing this question, said that he remained still of the same opinion that he entertained and expressed as a member of the committee on resolutions at Philadelphia. That certainly is a very happy coincidence; it is nothing more. There should be no embarrassment on the part of any Senator in the consideration of this question here by reason of anything that was done in the Philadelphia convention. When a judge takes his seat upon the bench he does not feel constrained by opinions given at the bar while acting under private retainer. His point of view has been radically changed. He is no longer the advocate of private interests, but the exponent of public justice.

Now, Mr. President, I beg leave——

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Has the Senator from Wisconsin finished?

Mr. QUARLES. I have not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOAR. I beg pardon; I thought I had the floor.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, some one has sent me an anecdote, which seems to me very apropos to the position of the Senator from Wisconsin in regard to national platforms. There is nothing offensive in it, and, if he does not object, I will send it to the desk and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the reading of the paper sent to the desk?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not think it is fair to inject anything like that into the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. QUARLES. I should prefer to have the Senator from Pennsylvania reserve the article and print it in his own speech when he makes it.

Mr. QUAY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the reading of the paper. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. QUARLES. Do I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] desires to say something?

Mr. HOAR. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought perhaps the Senator was giving up the floor for to-day, and I desired to ask for the passage of a bill. But I misunderstood the interruption.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I should be very glad at this point to yield the floor until to-morrow morning.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to move an executive session.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to call up a bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield for that purpose.

CRIMINAL, PAUPER, AND DEFECTIVE CLASSES.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senate to take up for consideration the bill (S. 6032) to establish a laboratory for the study of the criminal, pauper, and defective classes. If it raises discussion I shall not press it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That there shall be established in the Department of Justice a laboratory for the study of the abnormal classes, and the work shall include not only laboratory investigations but also the collection of sociological and pathological data, especially such as may be found in institutions for the criminal, pauper, and defective classes, and generally in hospitals and schools. Said laboratory and work shall be in charge of a director, who shall be appointed by the President, and shall receive a salary of $3,000 per annum. He shall make a report once a year, directed to the Attorney-General, which, with the approval of that officer, shall be published. For the proper equipment of said laboratory, and the rental, if necessary, of a suitable room therefor, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be required.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. I do not object, but I think we ought to have a brief explanation by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Illinois does not object, I will say a word only.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this is a bill which has been petitioned for by learned and scientific bodies without number all over the country. It relates to investigations as to the result of certain inherited physical conditions in the matter of crime. The Judiciary Committee have recommended it, with a great deal of hesitation I agree, but still on the whole the majority of the committee thought it was a desirable thing to do.

I confess it does not seem to me very likely that the bill will pass the House at the present Congress, though it may, but I thought it was due to the very earnest and devoted gentleman who has been engaged in that work formerly in the Bureau of Education and to the petitioners to ask the Senate to pass the bill if it would.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to say a word? The gentleman who has heretofore occupied a similar position, and who I suppose is asking for the passage of this bill, was an employee of the Bureau of Education. The head of that Bureau declined to consider him further in connection with it, and dropped out of the estimates the recommendation for the salary which had been allowed to him heretofore, and came before the Committee on Appropriations and made such a statement in reference to it as convinced the committee that it ought not to be continued. I hope the Senator will not press the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois object?

Mr. CULLOM. I feel constrained to object to its consideration to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will go over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, with amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That wherever and to the extent that the lands within the place limits of any railroad and wagon road land grant are arid or semiarid in character, and for that reason can not be utilized in tracts of single sections, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion and with the approval of the President, to exchange public lands which are vacant, unappropriated, arid or semiarid, not mineral, not timbered, and not required for reservoir sites or other public uses or purposes, for private lands of like area, character, and value in the alternate sections granted to the railroad or wagon road company, so far as may be necessary to assemble such public and private lands, according to ownership, in more compact bodies of such area as will permit them to be advantageously used. Every exchange hereunder shall be confined to lands withing the place limits of the railroad or wagon road land grant, and the public lands so exchanged must be of such relative contiguity to the private lands surrendered to the Government that the area of taxable lands in any State, Territory, or county will not be diminished. The railroad or wagon road company or its grantee must, at its expense and by appropriate instruments of conveyance, surrender to the Government a full and unincumbered right and title to the private lands included in any exchange before patents are issued for the public lands included therein, and no charge of any kind shall be made for issuing such patents. Upon the completion of any exchange the land surrendered to the Government therein shall become a part of the public domain. Nothing herein shall in any manner be so construed as to enlarge the quantity of land to which any railroad or wagon road company or any of its grantees may be entitled under existing law.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill providing for the better separation and utilization of public and private lands within the limits of railroad and wagon road land grants in the arid region."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The chair hears none.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] submitted the views of the minority, and if he demands a second, I yield to him for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. A second has been ordered. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Tennessee yields to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Washington desire to control the time against the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would like to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Very well; I yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington will be recognized. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, this is a Department measure, recommended and urged by the Secretary of the Interior, approved by the Committee on Public Lands by an almost unanimous report. It deals only with arid lands in the range regions of the West. It does not apply to timbered land, nor mineral lands, nor lands reserved by the Government for reservoirs or other purposes. The bill provides that in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior and the approval of the President of the United States certain lands, arid or semiarid in character, nonmineral, nontimbered, may be exchanged for public lands of equal value within the same place limits, exchanges to be limited to the same counties, so that the area or taxable value of the land shall not be either appreciated or diminished.

The pith of the whole matter is that land of this character, by reason of its aridity, is practically useless and worthless in isolated single sections. It takes from 40 to 50 acres of land affected by this bill to support a single head of stock. The streams in this section in the dry season are in many instances miles apart—in some instances 20 to 25 miles—so that the food question and the water question with the cattle dealers and the ranch men makes a single section of this land absolutely worthless and useless for present purposes or present use. In other words, the stock industry requires a large range. Under the existing situation there has been clashing and interference between the bona fide owners of these granted lands and those who claim the right of roaming pasturage over the public lands. The fence laws have created a great deal of disturbance.

Under the present law and under the decisions of the court the owner of private lands can not fence in his own holdings if thereby he incloses any of the public lands. This has made friction. It has made contention and strife, and in some instances has caused bloodshed between those who hold private land and those who claim the right of pasturage over the public domain. Experience shows—and I will leave it to anyone in this House who has made even a cursory examination of the question—that when the Government is in partnership with individuals the Government always gets the worst of it. This bill is intended to dissolve that partnership—to divorce the holdings of private owners and those who have the use, under the general custom, of the public domain. An objection will be made, no doubt, that this land ought to be left in single sections—not assembled, but left in single sections in the interests of the homesteader. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that land will always yield to its highest usefulness. If any of this land should in the future, either immediate or remote, be found capable of raising crops, be found fit for agricultural purposes, it could no longer be held for stock-grazing purposes, because this higher use will always call it into requisition.

This land at present is fit only for grazing, and it can only be used for that, and these owners will not be able to use it for grazing unless they can assemble their holdings so that a sufficient amount of land can be combined together for water purposes and for grazing purposes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BATES. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Kindly tell us how many acres of land will be affected by this bill.

Mr. BATES. The land affected by this bill is the nonarable, the arid, or semiarid lands of the land-grant district. I am unable to tell the gentleman how many acres will be affected.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is there any way of estimating how much?

Mr. LACEY. I will answer that question for the gentleman. There are about 17,000,000 acres of the land grants unsold. A portion of that is timber land. Out of this 17,000,000 only that portion which is useful for grazing purposes would be embraced in this proposition, and no more.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is it five, ten, or fifteen million acres?

Mr. LACEY. I should think probably half of it. That would be a rough estimate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman include in the estimate of 17,000,000 the 12,000,000 in Arizona and New Mexico?

Mr. LACEY. It is only the unsold railroad land grants.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That would make it nearly 30,000,000 acres of land. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this proposition is not to change from alternate sections in the land grants to the railroads to a consolidation of the interests of those roads?

Mr. BATES. No, sir. It only affects the arid lands. I ask every member of this House, before voting upon this proposition, to bear in mind that it only affects the arid lands or semiarid lands. The lands granted to the railroad companies of the West were arable in the Eastern and Middle Western States. It has no relation to such land, but only affects the arid and semiarid lands that are only fit for grazing purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does not this bill give the railroad companies the power of selection?

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, the exchange, if any should be affected under the operation of this bill, is in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President. And the bill directly states that the exchanges would be between lands of equal value; and the gentleman knows full well that the value of lands depends upon their location as well as upon the condition of the soil.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me? I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry at this time, if the gentleman will yield for just a moment. Mr. Speaker, I note in the report——

Mr. BATES. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. I notice the report of the committee contains the following amendment, which is not contained in the bill as printed. In line 3 of section 1, after the word "that," insert the following, namely, "at any time within five years after the approval of this act, and." I wish to inquire if the report in this case would govern or the print of the bill as now before the House? This is one of several committee amendments. The other committee amendments are all printed in the bill, but by some inadvertence or error this amendment is not in the bill as now before the House.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would carry with it the amendments reported by the committee—agreed to by the committee. The best evidence that the House could have before it is the report of the committee, and unless it is admitted this was a part of the report, the Chair does not see how it would be safe to say that the report of the committee contains the language.

Mr. MONDELL. This is a part of the report of the committee, and is simply not printed in the bill.

The SPEAKER. There is no question but what the amendment would be carried by the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but the Clerk will report the amendment.

In line 3, page 1——

Mr. BATES. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. BATES. I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until the Clerk reports the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3 of section 1, after the word "that," insert the following, namely, "at any time within five years after the approval of this act, and."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATES. I yielded to the gentleman from Wyoming for a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. BATES. Two minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I merely made the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BATES. I think I will reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have sometimes thought that the rules of this House ought to be changed, but when measures of this character come up in this way I think they ought to be enforced as strictly as possible. Whatever may be the merits or demerits of this bill, it is not a bill that ought to come up under the suspension of the rules, when only twenty minutes of debate can be allowed and no amendments can be made. This is a measure that I consider of very great importance. It involves the disposition of an immense amount of the public domain. The question was asked a while ago how much land this bill involved, and it was stated that the land grant unsold amounted to 17,000,000 acres. Why, gentlemen of this House, the land grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad alone, unsold, amounts to over 17,000,000 acres, according to their annual report of 1902.

Mr. BATES. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BATES. Is the gentleman from Washington possessed of information as to how much of that land is arid and semiarid and would be affected by this bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will come to that a little later. The question was asked how much land remained unsold, and it was stated that there are 17,000,000 acres. Now, there are 17,000,000 acres in the Northern Pacific grant, alone, unsold; an immense tract belonging to the Union Pacific, and an immense tract belonging to the Southern Pacific. The whole amount of land, in grants, involved in this bill is from fifty to sixty and it may be seventy-five millions of acres—no man can tell. The friends of this bill can not tell; they do not know how much is involved.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There are 15,000,000 acres in New Mexico alone.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. I want to say to the gentleman from Washington that when called upon to give the figures I gave them from the report of the minority, as it footed it up, 17,000,000 acres, but I find that that was a mistake.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; that is the Northern Pacific alone. It seems, Mr. Speaker, that the majority themselves never figured this up to see how much it involves. They do not know how many acres of the public domain are affected by this bill. It is true that it applies to only the semiarid and arid lands, but no man can tell how much land is arid and semiarid. A great proportion of the unsold grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad is arid and semiarid land. Now, how much is involved under the Southern Pacific, how much is involved under the Union Pacific, I do not know. But I do say, gentlemen, that this is a proposition presented to the members of this House that involves almost one-fifth of the public domain of the United States, and we are asked to pass upon it in a twenty-minute debate on a side. I say, if for no other reason, this proposition to suspend the rules and consider this bill ought to be voted down.

It is surprising, gentlemen, to see the forces behind this bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES] who has no arid lands in his State, who has no land grants to railroads in his State, is pushing this bill. Why? I do not question his motive. He is representing the interests of some of his constituents who have holdings that will be affected. I received a letter from a gentleman in Pennsylvania a few days ago urging the passage of this bill. Why? Because he has four or five hundred thousand acres of land in Montana that he bought from the railroad company, knowing the condition, knowing the checker-board plan, and now he wants the Government to come in and help him to get his land together in one body so he can use it to better advantage. The only purpose in this bill is that those who own thousands and hundreds of thousands of acres in this country, within railroad grants, who purchased those lands knowing their situation, knowing their circumstances, knowing the relation they had to the public lands, now come to the Government and want us at the Government expense, upon the investigation by Government agents, to pass legislation for their sole benefit, and not for the benefit of the Government.

Oh, our friends say, pass this bill and the public lands will be put into a compact body, and that will help the Government by inducing settlement.

Now, if a section of land to-day is of no benefit to a settler under the present conditions, how can it be when it is segregated? Remember that the settler to-day, after the passage of this bill, can only take 160 acres as a homestead. If 160 acres on one side of a section to-day will not support a family, how will it when placed in any other part of the public domain? Now, what lands under this bill will be surrendered? The poorest lands, of course. What lands will they select? Why, the very best lands they possibly can, of course. How can this help the Government? How will it encourage settlement? It would not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does this bill apply to any land outside of the 6 miles on each side of the railroad?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Twenty miles on each side of the road. It does not apply outside the limits of the grants. Oh, but they say the selection must have the approval of the President of the United States and the Secretary. What does that amount to, gentlemen? No man has more confidence in the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior than I have, but do you propose that they shall go and examine these tracts of land? Certainly not. They must take the representation of their subordinates and their agents. Every patent issued to-day is issued with the approval of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior, and yet the report of the Secretary of the Interior bristles with charges of frauds against the public-land laws and the procuring of patents to the public domain. They must depend upon the reports and examinations of subordinate officers.

And we know how easy it is for a person to get a report from a subordinate officer. Suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania should go into the arid and semiarid region and examine the lands proposed to be surrendered and those to be selected. He would probably report them as being of comparatively little value. Yet, within a year or five years these tracts of land may be of very great value. I know that in the State of Washington—I speak more from my own knowledge of conditions in that State than from any knowledge as to conditions in other States—I say that in the State of Washington lands within the grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad which five years ago sold for 50 cents an acre are to-day selling at $10, $12, and $15 an acre, and are producing from 35 to 40 bushels of wheat to an acre. At that time they would have been considered as arid lands. We do not know what this arid and semiarid land may prove to be worth. Arid or semiarid to-day, it may be very valuable and productive next year.

What does it mean to pass this bill? It means to entail upon the Department of the Interior an immense expense. The Commissioner of the Land Office recommends this year an increased appropriation of $100,000 for special agents. The Department has not sufficient force at its command to investigate the condition of things as they are now. Yet this bill proposes that an investigation of these millions of acres of land must be done by the Government at the Government's expense for the benefit of these private holders. That means thousands and thousands of special agents to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. Gentlemen, this is a bill which ought not to pass under any circumstances, much less under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG], and reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, I wish to say to this side of the House, although this is not at all a political question, that this is a thoroughly bad bill, and that every Democrat ought to vote against it. It is a squandering of the public lands for no other reason than to further some private interest. It has no purpose whatever except to advance the private interests of men who want to concentrate their lands at the expense of the Government. I hope that every Democrat will vote against the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

[Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES] in regard to the number of members of the committee joining in this report, a statement in which I believe he was mistaken. The number of members in attendance in the committee when this bill was passed was nine or ten, and the committee stood 5 to 4 or 6 to 4, I am not positive as to exact number. Other members who were not in attendance have announced their opposition to the bill. On the other hand, I think it fair to state that one member [Mr. FORDNEY] who signed the minority report telegraphed to me on Saturday that he had withdrawn his opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to consume the remainder of his time?

Mr. BATES. Not if the gentleman making the minority report desires more time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules——

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield four minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the attention of the House for a few minutes on this proposition. This is not a bill to increase the holdings of anybody. Under the Camfield case, which is reported in 167 United States, at page 518, it is held that the owners of land grants, the purchasers from land-grant roads, can not fence their holdings because in so doing they include even-numbered sections of public lands and deprive the public of access to those sections. This proposition is to permit, within the limits of a county, holdings to be consolidated under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior asks authority to do this. He is not fearful there will be any abuse. Every exchange must be within a particular county and extends no further. The owner of lands in one county may exchange for like lands in the same county. The same area of taxable land will still remain in use. It is limited only to grazing lands.

Mr. THAYER rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. LACEY. I decline to yield, as I have not the time. I should be glad to yield if I had the time. It requires from 40 to 50 acres of much of this grazing land to pasture one steer. If a man buys a section of land a mile square and has only a comparatively small herd of cattle, a dozen or twenty, if he can buy four sections and fence them together he will have a field in which he can take care of more cattle, and the alternate sections exchanged will be located in the other part of the country, where they are held by the Government. That is all there is in this proposition. When the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] says it is a proposition to advance the value of private holdings, that is true, because the value of private holdings will be advanced if they can be fenced. If they can not be fenced, and the only right the holder has is to pay taxes on them, of course they will depreciate in value. This is a proposition to advance in value these private holdings; in short, to allow the grazing land to be used as grazing land is used in Texas, and it is to the advantage of the private holder, but deprives no one of any right whatever.

The Secretary of the Interior has recommended making this exchange, subject alone to the approval of the President of the United States, and there is no possible danger that can arise, and whether the area is large or small makes no difference. The fact remains that there are millions of acres of dry land fit only for grazing, and the grass will be doubled in quantity if it can be fenced and taken care of. That land belongs to private holders to-day, and all they want is the privilege of fencing it in. Under the decision in the Camfield case, which I wish I had time to read to the House, holders of those lands can not fence their own lands. In some localities, notably California and South Dakota, those who desire to graze their cattle on the public lands can not safely do so, because they will violate the State law and trespass on the private lands and thus become liable for damages, so that in those States the rule is that cattle must be kept off private lands. This is necessary in order to enable the owners of cattle which run at large on the public domain to protect themselves by allowing the private lands to be segregated.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended so that I may ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES] has four minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] has five minutes remaining.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Washington has any time to yield, I will ask him to yield me three minutes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill because I believe a majority of the committee that reported it is opposed to it. I can not believe otherwise. We find a number of the committee signing the minority report in opposition to it, and this opposition is supplemented by the statements made by others who oppose the proposition but did not sign the dissenting views. It is also supplemented by the belief I have that no committee of this House, in my judgment, considering this bill in all its details, as we should consider it (and not in this manner under suspension of the rules), would report favorably a bill of this kind involving a change of a fixed policy, of holdings of from 30,000,000 to 70,000,000 acres of the public domain. It entirely changes the policy of the Government with reference to alternate sections. I am opposed to it because it enables large landowners, under the new irrigation project started last session, to choose and secure the sources of water supply and avail themselves to the exclusion of bona fide settlers under the United States law. It also authorizes in its final results the acquisition of immense landed estates, and to that extent denies the principle of homestead settling. It gives to railroads, subsidized by land grants of former years, new rights and privileges and advantages never intended by the original grant.

I am opposed to it because the railroads have all the rights they ought to have within the 40-mile limit and the additional 10-mile lieu limit, but this gives them an additional power of selection in territory outside of the present limitation, and they can exercise this privilege to the disadvantage of the settlers of the United States. I am opposed to it because this House can not in this manner and at this time give that due consideration which, in my judgment, the committee failed to give the measure. I trust that this side of the House and the other side of the House will defeat by a two-thirds vote legislation of such vital and sweeping scope when proposed to be passed under a suspension of the rules. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES of Washington. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] states that the Secretary of the Interior urges this bill. He does urge it. He did not, however, urge it in any of his reports. He never thought of the bill until it was referred to him by the committee. Then the matter was brought up by the friends of the measure.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] states that there are sections of this country where there are thousands of acres of land that are absolutely worthless except for pasturage. That is true, but it is not true as to many of the States affected by this bill. It is not true of the State of Washington. We have thousands of acres of arid and semiarid lands there, but there is no desire on the part of our people generally that there should be a segregation. Some of my friends who have large holdings would like the bill, but the masses of the people do not want it, and those who do are perfectly willing to subordinate their personal views to the general good. I believe that we are affected by this bill as much as any other State in this Union. As I stated a moment ago, lands in that State which five years ago were considered worthless, as the gentleman from Iowa states in regard to certain sections of the country, are growing 35 and 40 bushels of wheat to the acre.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not yield; my time is too short. This bill does not limit the selections of these lands to surveyed lands. They may go anywhere, between the limits of their grants, and select in the same county any surveyed or unsurveyed lands. They need not be contiguous. Oh, but gentlemen say they are confined to the county! That is true, but what does that mean in some of the counties of the West? In the county in which I live they can surrender land in one part of that county and select land a hundred miles away and still come within the terms of this bill. I venture to say that in Oklahoma, Arizona, Montana, and New Mexico they can go a still farther distance and be within the terms of this bill. As has been said here, it involves an entire departure from the policy of this Government with reference to land grants. When those grants were made they were made in this "checkerboard" way for a particular purpose. The object of this bill is to do away with that purpose.

It is to allow these holdings to be concentrated for the benefit of the railroads and those who have purchased lands within these place limits. Who have been urging this bill? None of the people from my State. The cattlemen of my State oppose this measure. The masses of the people generally oppose it. I do not blame these people for pressing this measure. They have a perfect right to urge measures for their benefit. It is for us as representing the whole people and the public interests to act in accordance with our views of the general welfare.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not. I admit that I received a letter from one of the best friends I have in Yakima County, and representing and expressing the views of a certain association there composed of friends of mine, urging the passage of this bill. But friendship can not control my judgment upon a proposition that involves the public domain and the rights of the people, nor would they have it do so. I trust this motion will not prevail.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has four minutes remaining.

Mr. BATES. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN].

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a misapprehension as to what this bill contemplates. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] referred to the fact that it might interfere with the irrigating ditches. The bill specifically provides that none of this land shall be exchanged unless it is arid or semiarid, nonmineral, not timbered, and not required for reservoir sites.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, let me say that here is the proposition, where every alternate section is owned by private parties. Those lands can not be sold by sections on account of the Government holding the land adjoining. When they undertake to fence their own land, without putting a post on the Government land, ipso facto the Government land becomes fenced, because the fence surrounds it on all sides, and then a howl goes up to Congress that the Government land is being fenced. I say if you desire fair treatment and the development of that country, in fairness you should allow a man who owns scattered tracts of land to furnish the deeds to the Government at his own expense, so that this exchange can be made in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, if it is deemed advisable. That is all there is to this proposition. Here is a township of land, every alternate section belonging to a railroad company. They can not sell theirs, they can not use theirs, because they can not fence it. The Government owning the balance of the land alternating with them, this bill provides they may exchange like for like with the Government and secure their land in one tract and the Government secure their land in one tract. That is all there is to this bill, and it is limited, furthermore, to the county in which the land is situated.

Mr. BATES. I yield the remaining two minutes to the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at my friend from Washington [Mr. JONES] claiming that no one in his locality is in favor of this bill. I have in my hand a letter, which I will put into the RECORD, from the Washington Wool Growers' Association, from the gentleman's own district, asking for the passage of this bill. It is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE WASHINGTON WOOL GROWERS' ASSOCIATION,
North Yakima, Wash., January 21, 1903.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
Representative from Washington, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Through your kindness this office has just received H. R. Report No. 3101, being the report of the committee on H. R. bill No. 15008, and also the views of the minority on the same and adverse to the report of the whole committee.

This bill came before the Washington Wool Growers' Association at its last regular meeting on the 13th instant for consideration. There was a large representation present from different parts of the State; there was much said in favor of the proposed bill by the members, and not a word against it. My letter to you of December 23 on this subject was read and accepted as the sense of the association.

Have just hurriedly read the pamphlet and some thoughts have occurred to me in this perusal.

Does not the reference to "baronial estates" savor more of the fervid eloquence of the "stump" rather than the calm, logical examination of a proposition in a formal report? We must take things as we find them; these "estates," however so much "foreign and contrary to our interests," were created years ago, and long before this State existed as such, and this bill proposes to deal with a condition and not a theory, and place these "same estates" in such shape as to render them useful through consolidation, and then we can safely depend upon local taxation to do whatever may be necessary in the matter of reducing them.

It does not appear from a casual reading of the "bill" that the Government is about to enhance the value of private holdings "without compensation;" lands of "like area, character, and value" must be surrendered for exchange without expense to the Government. If the "poorest" are surrendered for exchange they can only, by the terms of the "bill," be considered in connection with lands of like poverty.

That the action and approval of the President and that of the Secretary of the Interior must be based upon the reports of subordinates is a condition common to all Governmental affairs. This preliminary duty can easily be performed by United States deputy surveyors in connection with their other work, and thus avoid the "immense force" and millions of expense so dreaded by the minority.

True, private holdings will be concentrated, and likewise those of the Government, within land-grant limits. Whatever better position may come to the private owner must also inure to the Government, as the exchange when made must be within the land-grant limits and within the narrow boundaries of a county in each and every case. So circumscribed is the territory for the assembling of land in any one instance—as Secretary Hitchcock so forcibly and aptly explains it in recommending the bill, "No roaming right of selection is given"—that it is impossible for any such disparity to exist as the minority seem to fear.

It is a case for governmental "interference," as everyone will be benefited and no one put in a worse condition than at present. There will be no diminution of public domain for the acquisition of the homesteader, and what there is will be in a more attractive situation, not sandwiched in between hostile holdings. The railroad lands in this State, a long narrow strip checkerboarded through the center of Washington, will be grouped in solid blocks in the several counties, in a more suitable shape for use or sale, consequently of more value, and thus, through taxation, bring in greater revenue to this Commonwealth. Really there will then be more public domain for the settler and homesteader, as the practice of taking up a string of "forties" through an even section, to thus connect alternate railroad sections, will cease, and you well know in such cases the best is always gobbled up. The fencing of Government land, as referred to in mine of December 23, will also stop, there being no further incentive for such trespassing.

This assembling of lands in compact bodies, instead of being a "menace" to irrigation projects, must prove to be an additional incentive to such undertakings, as we have all long since discovered that the greatest trouble in promoting and financing legitimate feasible irrigation propositions is to obtain enough concentrated acreage to attract capital for such expensive operations.

These are a few of the thoughts that come to me as I hurriedly read the bill, the recommendations of Mr. MOODY of Oregon, and the adverse report of the minority.

In view of the support the measure receives from such high authority as Secretary Hitchcock, the benefit it will be to a very large number of your constituents, it is hoped that you will reflect on what is herein contained and other letters from this office and then reconsider your action and assist Mr. MOODY and others in obtaining the passage of the bill recommended by the House Committee on Public Lands, No. 15008.

Very respectfully, yours,

R. K. NICHOLS, Secretary and Treasurer.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. LACEY. I can not yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is the letter that I referred to in my remarks.

Mr. LACEY. This proposition limits the exchange to each county. It relieves these men from liability under the Camfield case, so that they may fence their own land. Under existing law they must fence the Government land when they fence their own; and as this is forbidden, they can not fence their own lands. They find themselves in controversy with the Department of the Interior because they have inclosed public lands. This proposition is a solution of that difficulty, and that is why the Secretary of the Interior favors the enactment of the bill.

Now, the opposition comes from Texas. Why? Texas has all her arid lands fenced, all under grazing leases, every foot of them in use, and they know that under that arrangement the amount of grass has doubled in the State of Texas, as it would double in the State of Wyoming or in the other arid States where the grass on private lands could be protected.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LACEY. I can not yield. I have but two minutes. If the same arrangement is made in Wyoming as is made in Texas, the same results will ensue and the same increase of grass will be found. In those States where the land is fenced into different fields the land is permitted to rest one year and the next year to be grazed. Much of the grass is annual. It must go to seed. Under the existing arrangement a man can not permit the grass to go to seed on his own land, because he can not fence the land. This bill will give the same acreage in each county as at present under private ownership and the same acreage in each county under Government ownership. No harm is done to anybody, and the Secretary of the Interior can not make the exchange until it is approved by the President of the United States.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that there is no more time to consider this bill, but it is a bill that addresses itself to the equity and right of the House. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] only complains that the bill will increase the value of the private holdings. If such holdings can be increased in value without injuring anybody else, it should be done.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. All debate has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES] to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that in his opinion two-thirds not having voted in favor of the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was rejected.

LIEUT. ROBERT PLATT.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 3317) authorizing the President to appoint Lieut. Robert Platt, United States Navy, to the rank of commander.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint Robert Platt, lieutenant of the junior grade, United States Navy, not in the line of promotion, to the rank of commander, United States Navy, and to place him on the retired list of the Navy as such.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask that Senate Report No. 380 of the Fifth-fifth Congress, first session, be read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1126) authorizing the President to appoint Lieut. Robert Platt, United States Navy, to the rank of commander, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

The committee recommend the passage of the bill for the reasons set forth in the following statement of facts:

Robert Platt is borne on the Navy Register as "Lieutenant, junior grade, not in line of promotion." This case is unique. After thirty-three years' service in the Navy, which includes service during the rebellion that gained honorable mention and high commendation from Admiral Du Pont and other naval officers under whom he served, Lieutenant Platt stands at the foot of the junior officers of the grade held by him, the seniors of whom were not born when he was serving with the fleet of Admiral Du Pont in the attack upon Charleston. Born in North Carolina in 1835, Lieutenant Platt went to sea at an early age, and was trained in that maritime school that has given so many distinguished men to the American merchant and naval marine. Upon the breaking out of the rebellion Lieutenant Platt was a prosperous skipper, with thorough knowledge of his business and familiarity with the Southern coast and harbors. Tempting offers from representatives of the Confederate States and the appeals of relatives and old associates were unavailing to induce him to abandon allegiance to the United States.

For a short time prior to the breaking out of the rebellion Lieutenant Platt was in the service of the United States Coast Survey as first master, mate, and executive officer of the steamer Bibb. His services with the Coast Survey were of a character to secure for him the highest commendation of the chief officers thereof, and the experience acquired by him while on that duty made him a specially valuable man to the naval forces operating against the harbors and seaport cities of the Confederacy.

When hostilities commenced in 1861 the vessels of the Coast Survey were turned over to the Revenue-Marine Service and became an auxiliary force of the Navy. Appreciating the ability and loyalty of Lieutenant Platt, his superior officers earnestly recommended his appointment as lieutenant in the Revenue Marine. The following letters show the estimation in which Lieutenant Platt was held:

NORFOLK, VA., April 9, 1861.

SIR: Mr. Robert Platt is deserving of receiving a commission in the Revenue Service, and I take great pleasure in joining his friends in recommending him for the place. He served with me as senior master mate and executive officer of the surveying steamer Bibb for a number of years, and besides his competency, of which I can not speak too highly, he is a gentleman in his manner, habits, and associations; he is also strictly moral, and his appointment would, in my opinion, secure to that service a ready-made and efficient officer.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. MURRAY,
Lieutenant Commanding, United States Navy.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

UNITED STATES STEAMER BIBB,
Perth Amboy, May 1, 1861.

DEAR SIR: I beg leave to introduce to your favorable notice Mr. Robert Platt, the chief officer of this vessel, who has been connected with the Coast Survey for some years, during which time he has become acquainted with our harbors and coast.

These vessels are now to be turned over to the Revenue Service, when Mr. Platt must be thrown out of employment should he not receive what he is desirous of obtaining, "an appointment as lieutenant in the Revenue Service." Mr. Platt is a native of North Carolina. "His love of the flag" is stronger than that of the "States-right doctrine," owing to which he is unable to return to his native State to battle for the Union.

Under these circumstances, and the fact that he has such high testimonials as to character and qualifications, I have been induced to ask that you would be pleased to assist him with your influence to obtain the desired situation.

I would not presume to ask this was I not confident that the Government would in this, her time of need, obtain a most valuable servant.

Respectfully, yours,

N. C. BLAKE,
Lieutenant Commanding, United States Army.

Hon. W. V. BRADY.

Lieutenant Platt remained with the revenue-marine steamer Bibb as executive officer until March, 1863, when he was appointed acting ensign in the Navy by Admiral Du Pont for reasons that are set forth in the following letter:

[Dispatch No. 153, 1863.]

FLAGSHIP WABASH,
Port Royal Harbor, S. C., March 26, 1863.

SIR: I have the honor to inform the Department that I have appointed Robert Pratt, at present executive officer of the United States Coast Survey steamer Bibb, as acting ensign in the United States Navy from the 1st of March, this being the highest appointment I can offer.

I would, however, recommend that the Department should give him the appointment of acting master from the same date. Mr. Platt has been of great service in this squadron, is an educated and thorough seaman, and is, moreover, to pilot the fleet into Charleston Harbor, as I have reason to believe that his knowledge of the channel exceeds that of any of the few pilots we have here, and for which perilous service he has patriotically volunteered.

I may add that there are two other pilots in the squadron holding the position of acting master, which is a further reason for making the appointment.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. F. DU PONT,
Rear-Admiral, Commanding South Atlantic Blockading Squadron.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

Lieutenant Platt led Admiral Du Pont's fleet into the harbor of Charleston on April 1, 1863, his vessel leading the fleet and under the fire of the enemy's shore batteries. For his skill, coolness, and intrepidity Lieutenant Platt was specially commended by Admiral Du Pont. In acknowledgment of his services upon that occasion, Mr. Platt was advanced to the grade of acting master, his appointment coming from Admiral Du Pont with the following letter:

FLAGSHIP WABASH,
Port Royal, S. C., April 14, 1863.

SIR: I have the pleasure to inclose your appointment as acting master in the United States Navy, and you will report to Captain Boutelle in that capacity and continue your previous duties on the Bibb.

I avail myself of the occasion to express my commendation of your pilotage of the Weehawken, the leading ship in the attack on the Charleston ports, on the 1st of April, under my own observation, and which has been alluded to by Capt. J. Rodgers in the most favorable terms in his official report.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. F. DU PONT,
Rear-Admiral, Commanding South Atlantic Blockading Squadron.

Acting Master ROBERT PLATT,
U. S. S. Bibb, Port Royal, S. C.

The following extract from the official report of Captain Rodgers, to which reference is made in the foregoing letter of Admiral Du Pont, shows the value of Lieutenant Platt's services upon the occasion referred to:

* * * * * * *

All the officers and men behaved so admirably that I am unable to select one for especial commendation. I am much indebted to Mr. Robert Platt, of the United States Coast Survey steamer Bibb, for his cool and efficient pilotage of the vessel, which he continued to direct after a ball touching the pilot house immediately over his head had given him a severe concussion. * * *

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JOHN RODGERS, Captain.

Rear-Admiral S. F. DU PONT,
Commanding South Atlantic Blockading Squadron.

Mr. Platt remained on duty with the blockading fleet until the termination of the war, performing such service as was assigned him. When the war closed Mr. Platt, upon the application of Carlisle Patterson, then Chief of the Coast Survey, was assigned to that service. He remained with the Coast Survey for several years, being continued in the Navy as a volunteer officer. June 15, 1878, an act was passed by Congress making Mr. Platt master in the Navy, not in the line of promotion. By the act of March 3, 1883, the grade of master was abolished and the grade of junior lieutenant established. Although there was no specific reference to Master Platt in that act, he was continued on the Navy Register as "lieutenant (junior grade), not in line of promotion." It is a question whether, by the act of March 3, 1883, Mr. Platt did not become a lieutenant (junior grade) without limitation.

During all these years Mr. Platt has continued to serve the Government with efficiency and fidelity. For some time past he has been in command of the United States Fish Commission steamer Fish Hawk, and has performed valuable service in connection with the propagation of food-fish and in obtaining information touching their nature and habits. With thirty-three years' service in the Navy, of which over twenty years have been sea service, and three of which were during the war, he is still a junior lieutenant. He asks, in view of his long and faithful service and of the fact that he reached the age of 62 in March, 1897, the age at which officers above the grade of lieutenant are retired, that Congress pass an act authorizing his appointment to the grade of commander, not in the line of promotion, to the end that he may, having reached the age of 62, be retired with that grade.

It may be urged that this is an unusual request, but it can be truthfully said that this is not only an unusual case, but one without precedent, and one which is not likely to again be presented. Mr. Platt was granted admission to the Navy with a limitation as to promotion, which had to be acquiesced in in order to overcome the opposition of those who would be affected by his full admission. Had he been admitted without limitation he would have attained the grade of commander before reaching the age for retirement, and in the intervening years would have been in the enjoyment of the additional pay that attaches to the grades above that which has been continually held by him. Lieutenant Platt's long and faithful services justify him in asking Congress to give him the measure of relief asked for, and the fact that Lieutenant Platt remained loyal to the Government at a time when men of his abilities and special equipment were offered liberal inducements to accept service from the Confederacy; that he abandoned his home and severed the bonds which united him to kindred and friends and voluntarily offered his services to maintain the integrity of the Union, should be given consideration in this connection.

The sacrifices made by those men of Southern birth who remained loyal to the Government have been frequently recognized by Congress and the Executive in individual cases. Special recognition was given this class of citizens by Congress in the act of August 15, 1876, by which it was provided that commodores in the Navy "who, being at the outbreak of the late rebellion, citizens of any State which engaged in such rebellion, exhibited marked fidelity to the Union in adhering to the flag of the United States," should, upon retirement, be retired with the grade of rear-admiral. If special recognition should be the reward of naval officers under the conditions described in the act above quoted, surely the citizen under like conditions, who was free from the moral and legal obligations resting upon the naval officer to remain loyal to his flag, is deserving of equal recognition from Congress.

The advancement of Lieutenant Platt to the grade of commander, not in the line of promotion, would not affect any officer on the Naval Register, and would involve to the Government a comparatively trifling expenditure, and that only for a very limited period. It would be a fitting recognition of long and faithful services, and would enable an old and faithful officer, whose life has been passed in the public service, to maintain himself and family during the few years that remain to him.

MARINE BARRACKS,
Navy-Yard, Boston, Mass., April 21, 1896.

This is to certify that Mr. Robert Platt (now Lieut. Robert Platt, United States Navy) and I served together on coast-survey duty on the coast of Maine in 1861, just after the outbreak of the war. Mr. Platt was then the sailing master of the schooner Arago, which vessel was temporarily detached from coast-survey duty and armed by orders of the Government at Washington, with orders to cruise off that coast, prevent arms and munitions of war being sent by sea to the rebels, and one especial order was to cruise for and capture four rebel vessels which were reported to have run the blockade at New Orleans. The names of these vessels were Alice Ball, Orozimbo, Express, and Peter Marcy. Through the active efforts and good judgment of Captain Platt three of these ships were captured. Captain Platt himself brought the Alice Ball into Eastport (Maine) Harbor with the rebel flag union down and our flag above it. A large party in Eastport was at that time unfriendly to the Government, and often threats were made that they would take the three captured ships (Alice Ball, Express, and Orozimbo) from us, but Captain Platt's vigilance and the excellent discipline he had in force in his command prevented any such action on the part of the citizens of the town, and the vessels were retained until delivered to other officials of the Government.

ROBT. L. MEADE,
Major, United States Marine Corps.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the facts stated in this report furnish a stronger argument for the passage of the bill than I could possibly construct and a more eloquent plea for justice than I have language to express. Three times the Navy Department has recommended its passage.

At three sessions of Congress the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs found the facts as above and recommended the passage of the bill, and each time the Senate passed the same.

The House Committee on Naval Affairs has also three times reported the bill favorably and recommended its passage.

I deem it a privilege to make the final motion that will bring long-delayed justice to this American citizen, who has served in the United States Navy thirty-three years, over twenty years of which was on the sea, which included service during the rebellion that gained honorable mention and high commendation.

I hope this bill will pass without a dissenting vote.

The question was taken; and two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill passed.

NEW AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the following Senate bill with the amendments recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill which the Clerk will report with the amendments recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4722) for the erection of a building for the use and accommodation of the Department of Agriculture.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a suitable and commodious fireproof building, for the use and accommodation of the Department of Agriculture, including all of its bureaus and officers now occupying rented quarters in the District of Columbia, to be erected on such portion of the grounds of the Department of Agriculture belonging to the United States as he may deem expedient immediately in the vicinity of the present building, said building to be constructed in accordance with plans, to be procured, based on accurate estimates, providing for the erection of said building, complete in all its details, as herein described and within a total cost of not exceeding the sum herein stipulated, and he is hereby authorized, after procuring such plans, and after due advertisement for proposals, to enter into contracts within the limit of cost hereby fixed and subject to appropriations to be made by Congress for the erection of said building complete, including heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, and the removal of the present building or buildings of the Department of Agriculture on said grounds.

SEC. 2. That the supervision of the construction of said building shall be placed in charge of an officer of the Government especially qualified for the duty, to be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, subject to the approval of the head of the department in which such officer is employed, who shall receive for his additional services an increase of 25 per cent of his present salary, such increase to be paid out of the appropriation for the building herein authorized.

SEC. 3. That the limit of cost for the construction of said building complete, including heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, and the cost for removal of the present building or buildings of the Department of Agriculture, is hereby fixed at $1,500,000, and no contract shall be entered into or expenditure authorized in excess of said amount.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman a question, if I can have order, so that I can ask it.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order, and gentlemen will please cease conversation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker, I first address to the Chair, whether this recognition of the gentleman is to make a motion on behalf of the Committee on Agriculture, or is it an individual request?

The SPEAKER. These are individual suspensions, all of them.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Individual recognition?

The SPEAKER. It is individual suspension day.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I know; but the Chair has the option of recognizing committees or individuals.

The SPEAKER. But this is an individual recognition.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I know that priority is given to the committee if it requested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is right about that, but these are individual recognitions.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, I want to ask the gentleman if the Agricultural Committee approves unanimously making this motion to suspend the rules and pass this bill?

Mr. MERCER. The Committee on Agriculture has nothing to do with it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MERCER. Yes, sir; it is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then I have no objection to a second being considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized to control twenty minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee twenty minutes.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that has been before the country and Congress for several years. The committee has been in receipt of communications from all parts of the United States requesting that this legislation be had. As members know, the Department of Agriculture is very much limited as to its space. It occupies a very old and unsatisfactory building. The Department is growing rapidly, and to-day, as we all know, it is one of the greatest Departments of this Republic. Its usefulness is increasing, and it needs more room and better accommodation in order that it may properly transact its business. I think most of the members of this House are personally familiar with the situation, and know that this measure is a just one. The committee is of the opinion that a building, and a substantial building, large enough to satisfy all branches of the Department can be erected on this ground, which is Government ground, in the vicinity of the present building within the limit of cost covered by the amendments to the Senate bill.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman if this bill is in the usual form that the committee prescribes for public buildings in the city of Washington?

Mr. MERCER. It is in the usual form, except in this particular, that the Secretary of Agriculture has been authorized to take charge of the construction of this building. In most authorizations for public buildings the Secretary of the Treasury is given authority to control and superintend construction, but the Secretary of the Treasury has no objection to this feature of the pending bill, and it seems to be the desire of the Agricultural Department to have the legislation in this form.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I only wish to say that I did not demand a second with a view of opposing the passage of this bill. I did not know until the gentleman made the motion that a motion was to be made to suspend the rules and pass it; therefore I have not had an opportunity to investigate it. But inasmuch as the minority members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have joined in the recommendation, I shall make no objection. If there is any gentleman on this side of the House or on the other side of the House who desires to be heard in opposition of the bill, of course I will yield him time out of the twenty minutes. Having demanded the second, and the time having been given to me under the rules, I feel it is right and proper to make this statement, in order that any gentleman who desires to oppose the bill may not be misled but may have an opportunity to speak. For myself I do not oppose the passage of the bill.

Mr. MERCER. I do not think there is any disposition to oppose the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments which have been read.

The question was taken, and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

JOHN RUSSELL BARTLETT.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate bill 4222.

The SPEAKER. Are there any amendments?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes, sir; with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia moves to suspend the rules and pass with an amendment the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4222) authorizing the appointment of John Russell Bartlett, a captain on the retired list of the Navy, as a rear-admiral on the retired list of the Navy.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is hereby authorized to appoint John Russell Bartlett, now a captain on the retired list of the Navy, to be a rear-admiral on the retired list of the Navy, with the rank and pay of said office: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 7, strike out the words "and pay."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I demand a second.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill in behalf of a retired naval officer who has a very remarkable record. He was a midshipman at the Academy in the third class when the war broke out in 1861. Before graduation he was sent from the Academy on board the Brooklyn and was under Farragut in the passage of the forts at New Orleans, and was also in the naval battle at Vicksburg and in the two charges on Fort Fisher. In 1897, only a few months before the passage of the personnel bill, and after a life of active service in the Navy, and a record which I say is as good as that of any officer in the Navy, he was retired for nervous disease known as neurasthenia, which, as I understand, is almost equivalent to nervous prostration. In a few months afterwards he recovered his health, and during the Spanish war, under the law that provides for the employment of retired officers, he was placed in active service and did conspicuous service in behalf of his country. Being in good condition and good health to-day he is discharging his duties actively as a retired officer, discharging active duty in the naval service in connection with the general board over which Admiral Dewey presides.

He was retired a few months before the passage of the personnel bill, which would have authorized him to be retired with the rank of a rear-admiral. The bill carries no pay, the House Committee having amended it so as to simply give him the rank of a rear-admiral. I want to say to the gentlemen of the House that his long and conspicuous service to his country, both when on the active list and since during the Spanish war, and even now, warrants and merits this recognition on his behalf. The Navy Department has recommended it and it has passed unanimously the Committee on Naval Affairs. I want to say further to the members of the House that it has been the uniform policy of the Naval Committee to closely scrutinize these bills and to report very few of them, and only under extraordinary circumstances and conditions. A great many of the officers on the retired list feel that an injustice was done them by the passage of the personnel bill. We have adopted the general policy where a retired officer is willing to undertake the active duty and does go into active service of the Navy to supply the need existing of officers to continue and perform active duty to encourage that. We have deemed it proper and right in certain cases to give them this promotion in cases like this without pay.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. I understand the gentleman to say that this bill proposes to give him the rank and not the corresponding pay.

Mr. DAYTON. He does not ask that.

Mr. STEELE. As the bill reads it would give him pay corresponding to his rank. It does not specially provide that he shall not have the pay of the rear-admiral.

Mr. DAYTON. The Senate bill provides a corresponding pay with the rank. Provides that the President is authorized to appoint him to be rear-admiral on the retired list of the Navy, with rank and pay of said office. The House amendment strikes out the word "pay," and now it provides that he shall be retired a rear-admiral, with the rank of said office but not the pay. He will draw the pay of a captain.

Mr. STEELE. I do not think there is any question that if he is retired as a captain he would be paid as a captain, and that if he was retired as a rear-admiral he would be paid as a rear-admiral. Now, another point: The gentleman says a great many officers complain about the passage of the personnel bill. Are there not a great many of the officers who are equally entitled to the consideration that this officer is, and ought not this bill to be a general bill rather than to make it specific and apply to specific cases?

Mr. DAYTON. I do not think so. I do not think there is another officer in the Navy who passed with Farragut through the campaign in front of New Orleans and Vicksburg and Fort Fisher, and landed in both attacks. I doubt whether there is another officer in that class.

Mr. STEELE. If they did not it is their misfortune, for probably they would like to have been there.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that this officer merits promotion because of his long service since he has been on the retired list and in the active list. He went through the Spanish war and to-day fulfills the duties of an active officer and does it well. Every single officer in the Navy, in my judgment, will bear testimony to the fact that Capt. John Russell Bartlett is entitled to this recognition. I want to say further that as far as the pay is concerned I am absolutely sure, from an examination and from a consultation with the law authorities of the Navy and the rules and regulations governing it, that this bill does not carry a single dollar of pay as a rear-admiral, but that he will receive the pay of a captain and the rank of a rear-admiral.

Mr. STEELE. Would the gentleman object to providing that this officer shall only receive the pay and emoluments of a captain?

Mr. DAYTON. The bill already provides that he shall receive no pay or bounty or emoluments by the passage of this act. That is in the bill. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, my only object in demanding a second on this bill was that it might be properly debated. If the minority members of the Committee on Naval Affairs interpose no objection, I see no reason why I should oppose the bill. If any gentleman on either side of the House desires time to use in opposition to the bill, I will yield to him; if not, I am content that a vote be taken.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

BRIDGE ACROSS MONONGAHELA RIVER, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. DALZELL. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the desk, with the amendments of the committee.

The bill (H. R. 16975) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania, by the Eastern Railroad Company, was read, with the amendments of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MADDOX. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. DALZELL. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, this is a simple, everyday bridge bill, such a bill as is passed again and again by unanimous consent. There can not be any possible objection to it.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments of the committee, it was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

MUSCLE SHOALS POWER COMPANY.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I move to suspend the rules and pass, with the amendments of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 16602) to extend the time granted to the Muscle Shoals Power Company by an act approved March 3, 1899, within which to commence and complete the work authorized in the said act to be done by said company, and for other purposes, was read, as follows, with the amendments of the committee:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time allowed the Muscle Shoals Power Company by section 2 of an act entitled "An act granting to the Muscle Shoals Power Company right to erect and construct canal and power stations at Muscle Shoals, Ala.," approved March 3, 1899, to commence and complete the work therein authorized to be done be extended so that unless the work authorized in said act to be done be commenced within two years and completed within four years from the date of this act the privileges granted to said company by said first-mentioned act shall cease and be determined; and said company is authorized to erect and construct dams which may abut on lands of the United States Government along the line of the Muscle Shoals Canal, if approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for a second on the motion to suspend the rules. In the confusion I could not hear what the bill is.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] for ten minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, this is undoubtedly just such a bill as would pass by unanimous consent if certain conditions did not exist at this time in the House, known to us all. Therefore, in order to get the bill before the House, I had to resort necessarily to the motion for a suspension of the rules.

The object of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is simply to extend the life of a charter already granted by Congress to what is known as the Muscle Shoals Power Company. The necessity for asking this extension of time arises by reason of the fact that there is a question now under consideration, and not yet definitely settled, as to what rental, if any, the Government would be entitled to from this company for the use of the waters of the Tennessee River; and before this question can be settled, as the Chief Engineer of the War Department states in a letter to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, the life of this charter will expire, unless extended by a bill such as this.

Mr. PAYNE. For how long a period does this bill propose to extend the time?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. For three years.

Mr. STEELE. Is there not some question in regard to abutting property of the Government? Is there not some change of the law proposed in that regard?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. There is. The work of the company proposes to abut upon Government property; and the Chief of Engineers writes thus:

The privilege proposed to be granted is one that may result in embarrassment to the Government, and it may be a valuable one for which the company should be required to pay. As it is necessary that action shall be taken on the bill during the present session of Congress, in order to preserve the life of the franchise, there is not sufficient time to properly and carefully investigate these questions; but I am of the opinion that, if the bill is amended as indicated on a copy of the same herewith submitted, the interests of the Government will be protected, and that there will be no objection to favorable action by Congress thereon.

Mr. STEELE. Is the bill so guarded as to give the Government pay for any damages that may be done?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The question of damages is the one now under consideration; and the Chief Engineer has proposed that the bill be passed with an amendment which, of course, has been accepted by the committee and amply safeguards the Government in all its rights.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

THOMAS H. CARPENTER.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 661) authorizing the restoration of the name of Thomas H. Carpenter, late captain, Seventeenth United States Infantry, to the rolls of the Army, and providing that he be placed on the list of retired officers, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Thomas H. Carpenter, late a captain, Seventeenth Infantry, a captain of infantry in the Army of the United States; and when so appointed he shall be placed upon the list of retired officers of the Army, unlimited, on account of wounds received in battle, from which he is under disability.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DICK] such time as he may desire.

Mr. DICK. Mr. Speaker, this is a thoroughly meritorious case, the applicant having been wounded at the battle of Gettysburg, the ball passing through the knee and lodging under the kneecap. It was supposed by the surgeons then examining the wound that the ball has passed through the leg and that the wound would heal. Subsequently and repeatedly surgeons made examinations and found no trace of the ball, but the soldier was unable to march with his command, and after repeatedly asking to be retired, resigned his commission. It was only recently, through the assistance of the X-ray, that the ball was located and found to still be in the wounded leg, causing continued stiffness, and proving absolutely the claim of the soldier as to his inability to march with his troops. On this account the committee of the House has recommended the passage of this bill. The bill has already passed the Senate.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a word or two in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DICK]. This man was severely wounded, as the gentleman stated. He had a commission in the Regular Army. At the time that he was ordered to go to a certain place to perform active duty, he replied that he could not sustain the fatigue of active service in the field. After the board examined him and failed to find any trace of the ball, he was ordered to rejoin his regiment, and thereupon resigned. He had to resign, obey orders, or be court-martialed. It was impossible for him to perform his duty. He has been on crutches nearly all of the time since. It was at a time when most of the Regular Army officers were willing to get rid of all the volunteers they could who had received commissions in the Regular Army. The bill has passed the House several times during the past twenty years, and has also passed the Senate several times.

The man, in my judgment, presents one of the best cases that ever has come before Congress. His case has been reported upon by more committees who favorably recommended it than any other case with which I am at all acquainted. It seems to me that it is a very small act of justice to a man who should have been retired when he applied for retirement and who was conscientious enough to know that he could not do the duty. He was never able to prove to the Army officers or the surgeons the cause of his continued lameness until the X ray came to his assistance, when the ball was located, and, as I understand it, has since been extracted, though leaving him still crippled and lame.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to know when it was this gentleman resigned from the Army.

Mr. HULL. It was in 1866. The Regular Army after the civil war seemed willing to get volunteers out.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. At that time there was no retirement list.

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes; they were retiring officers then.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to know what effect this bill will have upon the pay the man will receive. Will the Government be called upon to pay him for any services in the past?

Mr. HULL. No, not at all. He will be paid nothing until the President nominates and the Senate confirms him as a captain on the retired list.

Mr. HEPBURN. What rank did he have?

Mr. HULL. He was a captain.

Mr. HEPBURN. What regiment?

Mr. HULL. He was in an Iowa regiment until, on account of gallantry, he was promoted to a position in the Regular Army.

Mr. BARTLETT. When was he wounded?

Mr. HULL. He was wounded at the battle of Gettysburg.

Mr. STEELE. What is the name of this officer?

Mr. HULL. Captain Carpenter.

Mr. STEELE. Was not Captain Carpenter discharged from the service because he preferred to go out of the service under the consolidation act of 1869 and receive a year's pay? Was he not included in that list?

Mr. HULL. No. The chairman of the subcommittee calls my attention to the fact that it was in 1866, and he was retired from the service because he was absolutely unable to go without his crutches at the time and could not perform active service. He had been serving as provost-marshal after receiving his wound.

Mr. STEELE. Retired or resigned?

Mr. HULL. Resigned.

Mr. STEELE. On account of the law giving him a year's pay?

Mr. HULL. No; the matter of a year's pay came about in 1870.

Mr. STEELE. And this man did not get a year's pay?

Mr. HULL. No.

Mr. STEELE. What rank did he have when he was retired?

Mr. HULL. He was a captain in the Regular Army.

Mr. STEELE. He was a captain when he retired?

Mr. PALMER. He did not retire; he resigned.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, in justice to the Regular Army I wish to say that I do not think it is fair to charge that officers of the Regular Army desire to get rid of volunteers. I can say from experience that there is absolutely no justification for that charge except in cases where the officers ought to have been gotten rid of. I do not know about this officer. The X-ray has come to his assistance, and if he had a gunshot under his kneecap, received during the war, I should not vote against his retirement. But it is unfair to charge the Regular Army with trying to get rid of volunteer officers.

Mr. HULL. I will say that he had to march or resign, as shown by the report. Some years ago, when Mr. Outhwaite was chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and I was on the subcommittee, I made a very full investigation of this case, and the committee unanimously reported that this man be restored to the Army, and the bill passed that House, in the Fifty-second or Fifty-third Congress, I am not certain which. It has passed this House or the Senate several times. The man was unable to march. The demonstration of the X-ray has shown why he was lame, and I will say to my friend that when they were reducing the Army afterwards it seemed to be a fatality that the volunteer soldiers were the ones that always got mustered out. I sincerely hope the House will pass this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to say about the merits of this bill. I presume this man was as good a soldier as any of the other officers who properly conducted themselves, and I suppose the case is as good a case as the usual bill that is brought up here to take a man from civil life and retire him on a pension. My objection to the bill is this: This officer, for reasons that were sufficient to himself, resigned from the Army over thirty years ago. Now, why he did that we do not know. If there was any question of justice to be done him, it ought to have been done then. There was no prejudice against a soldier in 1866.

Mr. HULL. While the gentleman is on that point will he pardon an interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. I understood the gentleman to say that he had waited some thirty years. He commenced more than twenty-five years ago to try to get justice done. I have been in Congress only twelve years, but I know he has been here every year that I have been here, and before that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that, but I say that over thirty years ago, according to the report, he of his own voluntary act sent his resignation to the Department. He was not mustered out——

Mr. DICK. But he had to do one of two things. Either he had to resign or he had to disobey orders. He could not obey the commands that were given to him, and therefore was compelled to resign.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, if he was unable to perform his duty as a soldier and as an officer that was the time for Congress or the Secretary of War to have done this man justice. If for his own reasons he saw proper to resign, and if for reasons that the Department deemed proper they were willing to accept his resignation, I say that the question in all justice and all equity should have been ended then.

Now, I have no reflections to make on this officer and this gentleman, but I say it is a late day for men who resigned from the Army thirty years ago, possibly to enter civil life in more remunerative employment than to stay in the Army, now that they happen to be broken in health or have failed in that business which they chose to follow, to come to Congress and contend that they shall be pensioned by putting them on the retired list to draw officer's pay, which pensions them at a great deal higher rate than their companions in arms have ever received. If this man has an injury to his leg he is entitled to a pension, but he is not entitled to retire and draw an officer's pay; and for that reason I have always opposed this class of bills, and I do not think they ought to be passed.

Mr. BARTLETT. This bill directs the President to appoint him in the Army.

Mr. DICK. If by reason of a recent invention the contention that he made forty years ago, that a bullet was lodged in his kneecap, and that therefore he could not march with his troops, is shown to have been correct, is it too late for Congress to do him justice, when by reason of that fact he was compelled to resign the service that he was performing at that time? He did not resign voluntarily. He resigned because he must do that or disobey the orders of his superiors and be court-martialed. Being compelled to do one of those two things, he chose to resign. And now, because of a recent invention which shows that his claim was meritorious and fair, he comes before Congress for the rectification of an injustice under which he has labored for more than a third of a century.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, my friend makes a very good argument, an ingenious argument, about an invention; but it seems to me it has nothing to do with the case. I see nothing here to show that the Department ever doubted the word of this officer that he was unable to walk, or that it took any invention to demonstrate to the Department that he was unable to serve. There is nothing here to show that he ever offered or asked for retirement.

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Did he go before a retiring board? That was his privilege at that time. He had the right to go before a retiring board.

Mr. HULL. He did, and the board decided against him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then if the retiring board found against him, why, it was his privilege either to agree to their orders or to resign from the Army. He exercised that right, and so it is too late a day for this man to come here now.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will permit just one word, for I know my friend wants to be fair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. The retiring board did not think his injury was a permanent one, though he went on crutches. It has been demonstrated since the X-rays have been invented that the man was absolutely right and the retiring board was absolutely wrong. Now, he had either to obey the order, be court-martialed, or resign. He preferred to go out with a clean record rather than be court-martialed. He has been upon crutches nearly all the time since. He now walks with a cane and has a bad limp, and it does seem to me that if my friend, with his usual fairness and generosity, will read the report, he will not object to the passage of this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My objection is not to this single case, but to all these cases. This is one of a number of cases of its class that I have always opposed since I have been in Congress. I believe that when these officers went out of the Army thirty years ago, went before a retiring board, their cases were considered by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, that ought to be an end of the matter, and they should not be brought up at this late day.

Mr. DICK. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. DICK. This is one of more than 2,000 bills of this kind that are pending before your Committee on Military Affairs. This one comes into this House with the unanimous report of that committee, who have considered it with great care and fairness.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will say, in reply to my friend from Ohio, that I find on a great many questions before this House there are a large number of gentlemen who disagree with me. I very often find myself in the minority, and I do not question the ability of those gentlemen on the Military Committee, both the majority or the minority side of the committee, but on this particular question I have always differed with the committee who have investigated the matter. I believe that it is too late to open up these cases and retire these men. I have always believed that there ought to be a day of final judgment, and we ought not to go into these old cases, thirty years old, and try them over again at this time, and for that reason I have opposed this class of bills.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds voted in favor thereof.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 16.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

WILLIAM P. RANDALL.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 5329.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 5329) authorizing the President to appoint Lieut. Commander William P. Randall, retired, United States Navy, a commander on the retired list.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Lieut. Commander William P. Randall, United States Navy, retired, a commander on the retired list of the Navy, with the retired pay of that grade from the date of such appointment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

AKRON, STERLING AND NORTHERN RAILROAD, ALASKA.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate joint resolution 146.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 146) to extend the time for construction of the Akron, Sterling and Northern Railroad in Alaska.

Resolved, etc., That the time within which the Akron, Sterling and Northern Railroad Company is authorized to construct its line of railroad from the head of Valdez Bay, in the Territory of Alaska; thence extending up Lowe River 12 miles to Keystone Canyon; thence for a distance of 3 miles through said canyon, on the west side thereof; thence through Dutch Valley a distance of 4 miles; thence 13 miles along the benches on the west side of Lowe River drainage, through Thompson Pass, as definitely located by said company, be, and the same is hereby, extended for two years from and after the passage of this resolution.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa demands a second.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for twenty minutes in favor of the joint resolution and the gentleman from Iowa for twenty minutes in opposition.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. What is the necessity of this bill? In other words, why can not they file a new plat under the law and take an extension of time under that instead of making an appeal to Congress?

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the gentleman that as I read the law, and as it seems that the Department reads the law, each 20 miles of railroad is to have a filing, and then there is one year to complete that 20 miles. Now, they have already filed their maps for this 20 miles, and they have a year in which to complete that, and then they will have to file another, and they will have a year to complete that. The Secretary of the Interior's letter is here, and it seems to indicate that this must be done.

Mr. LACEY. Why can not they refile a plat for that 20 miles and take this extension under the general law?

Mr. BURKETT. I apprehend if they had started out first as a new company and filed their plats they might go on with it. However, that would take a longer method, perhaps, than it would to pass this legislation, and not be as satisfactory as this will be.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Nebraska a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. SULZER. How many miles of this railroad have been surveyed?

Mr. BURKETT. I was just reading the statement of the company, and it seems they have made a survey clear through. They state that they have the materials all ordered and arrangements made for financing the proposition. As I understand it, the survey is already made now.

Mr. SULZER. As I understand the gentleman, no part of this railroad has been built as yet?

Mr. BURKETT. I take it from the report filed in the Senate and what I know about it that there has been no part yet built. In the first year during the short open season they surveyed and then had to file the surveys and finance it, and when they got back February came round and the time had expired. The time was from last February to this February, only leaving one open season, in which I understand they made the survey.

Mr. SULZER. Do I understand the gentleman to state that the Secretary of the Interior says in his letter that it is necessary for this resolution to pass, extending the time for constructing this road two years, in order for the company to hold what they now possess under the law?

Mr. BURKETT. From the statement he makes with reference to this matter they would lose their rights, because the law said that all the rights they had would be forfeited if not completed at the end of a year.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of building railroads in Alaska. The people up there need them to open up and develop the country. Now, I want to ask, was this company organized under the general law or by special act of Congress?

Mr. BURKETT. I think it was under a special act of Congress passed in 1898 for Alaska. In this country we have five years to complete a section of the road. That is under the act of 1879, probably, but under the special act for building roads in Alaska, although it is farther away and harder to get at, they were only given one year, or one-fifth of the time that we have here.

Mr. SULZER. This resolution simply extends the time; it gives the railroad company no public lands in Alaska?

Mr. BURKETT. No, sir.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I see no objection to the resolution, and I think it ought to pass.

Mr. BURKETT. As far as this bill is concerned, they get no land. I was not here when the special act was passed, and I do not know.

Mr. SULZER. I understand. All this resolution does is to extend the time two years to complete the railroad. I see no objection to that.

Mr. BURKETT. That is all.

Mr. SULZER. I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to ask the gentleman from what committee this bill is reported.

Mr. BURKETT. The Committee on the Territories.

Mr. CURTIS. Why did it not go to the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. BURKETT. I do not know. I had nothing to do with referring the bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

BOUNDARIES OF FEDERAL JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 14512) to amend an act to add certain counties in Alabama to the northern district therein, and to divide the said northern district, after the addition of said counties, into two divisions, and to prescribe the time and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes, approved May 2, 1884, as amended by the report of the Judiciary Committee. They have reported an amendment by way of a substitute, and I move that the substitute be adopted.

The Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of an act approved May 2, 1884, entitled "An act to add certain counties in Alabama to the northern district therein, and to divide the said northern district, after the addition of said counties, into two divisions, and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes," be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the said northern district is hereby divided into three divisions, which shall be known as the northern, southern, and eastern divisions of the northern district of Alabama. The southern division of said northern district shall include the counties of Sumter, Greene, Hale, Pickens, Tuscaloosa, Lamar, Fayette, Walker, Jefferson, Blount, Bibb, Shelby, St. Clair, and Dekalb, and a term of the circuit court and district court of the United States for said northern district shall be held for said southern division at the city of Birmingham, in the said county of Jefferson, twice in each year, at the times provided by law.

"The eastern division of said northern district shall include the counties of Etowah, Calhoun, Cleburne, Clay, Talladega, and Cherokee, and a term of the circuit court and the district court of the United States for said northern district shall be held for said eastern division in the city of Anniston, in the said county of Calhoun, twice in each year, on the first Mondays in May and November. The remaining counties of said northern district shall constitute the northern division thereof, and the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for said northern district shall be held therein at the times and places prescribed by law."

SEC. 2. That this act shall be in force from its passage, and all other provisions of the act aforesaid, approved May 2, 1884, and all acts amendatory thereof not inconsistent with this act, shall remain in full force and effect, and so far as they are applicable shall relate to and govern the eastern division of the northern district of Alabama.

SEC. 3. That a place for holding the courts for the eastern division of the northern district of Alabama shall be furnished to the Government free of cost by the county of Calhoun until other provision is made therefor by law.

SEC. 4. That all civil process issued against persons residents in said counties of Etowah, Calhoun, Cleburne, Clay, Talladega, and Cherokee, and cognizable before the United States courts, shall be made returnable to the courts, respectively, to be held at the city of Anniston; and all prosecutions for offenses committed in either of said counties shall be tried in the appropriate United States court at the city of Anniston.

SEC. 5. That all cases, civil and criminal, now pending on the dockets of the southern division of the northern district of Alabama, as herein created, shall remain on the docket of the southern division of said district and be tried in Birmingham, Ala., unless transferred to the dockets of the eastern division of said district by consent of all the parties thereto entered of record, or unless transferred by the order of court for good cause shown.

SEC. 6. That the clerks of the circuit and district courts of the southern division of the northern district of Alabama shall maintain an office, in charge of themselves or a deputy, at said city of Anniston, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of said courts.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Speaker, I find a slight typographical error in the title to the bill just passed. The word "time" in the title should be "times."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this correction will be made.

There was no objection.

KENSEY J. HAMPTON.

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass with amendments the bill (H. R. 15243) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint Kensey J. Hampton captain and quartermaster in the Army.

The Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States in his discretion be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Kensey J. Hampton, late captain and assistant quartermaster, United States Volunteers, to the grade of captain and quartermaster, United States Army, to fill the first, or any subsequent, vacancy in said grade in the Quartermaster's Department occurring after the passage of this act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be regarded as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Speaker, if in order, I ask that the report of the committee be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks for the reading of the report, which will be done in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. DICK), as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15243) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint Kensey J. Hampton captain and quartermaster in the Army, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with the following amendments:

After the word "States," in line 3, insert "in his discretion;" and after the word "first," in line 7, insert "or any subsequent."

The records of the War Department and other evidence before the committee show that Captain Hampton served as assistant quartermaster, United States Volunteers, from June 7, 1900, to June 30, 1901, when he was mustered out of the United States service. When the act of February 2, 1901, increasing the permanent establishment of the Army was passed, President McKinley appointed Captain Hampton to the same grade and staff in which he served in the Volunteer Army. At the time of his appointment he was on duty in the Philippine Islands on General Wheaton's staff and acting depot quartermaster for the Department of Northern Luzon. He was ordered up for physical examination before a board in Manila, which board reported him disqualified on account of a defect in the left eye.

However, two subsequent examinations were had by specialists for the eye—one by Dr. Stafford, of the First Reserve Hospital, Manila, and the other by Dr. Burnett, Washington, D. C.—both reporting that no serious defect could be found, and upon these reports the Surgeon-General of the Army waived the report of the first board and cleared his physical record. It seems from the evidence that the report of former board was unusual, as the defect discovered by the two specialists was slight, and has never caused Captain Hampton the slightest inconvenience or required him to wear glasses.

It was further shown that after the receipt at the War Department of the report of the examining board at Manila, and before Captain Hampton's arrival in the States after his muster out of the volunteer service, Alvin A. Barker, an officer of the Twenty-sixth Volunteer Infantry, was appointed and assigned to take the place for which he, Hampton, had failed to qualify; that eight days after Captain Barker was appointed he resigned without ever going on duty, and that Capt. Eugene F. Ladd, of the Ninth United States Cavalry, was detailed under the provisions of the new Army law to fill the place made vacant thereby.

It appears, therefore, that, while the law was technically complied with in the appointment and resignation of Captain Barker and the subsequent detail of Captain Ladd, really the place was never filled as contemplated by the act of February 2, 1901, and that Captain Hampton, who was appointed to this place by President McKinley, was kept from filling it by an error in the report of the board which examined him. It also appears that of all those designated for appointment by the late President McKinley in the various staff departments Captain Hampton was the only one who did not receive his commission.

The committee are of the opinion that this bill is exceedingly meritorious, and, therefore, recommend its passage with amendments.

The report of the Record and Pension Office, War Department, in this case is as follows:

Case of Kensey J. Hampton, late captain and assistant quartermaster, U. S. Volunteers.

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE,
War Department, December 8, 1902.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Military Affairs, having investigated this matter, have unanimously reported in favor of this bill, and authorized me to call it up.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. BOREING. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the only objection I have to this bill is the same objection I have to all this class of legislation. It is simply that we are invading the functions of another department of the Government and attempting to take men off the retired list or out of private life and legislate them into the Army, and then to retire them on full pay.

This man was retired by an Army board that knew the facts and had been appointed to conduct such examinations; yet, because he has political influence and probably is a good officer and a good man, he comes here and it is expected that we shall legislate him into the Army. This is a class of legislation which ought not to be passed. It is a matter with which Congress ought to have nothing to do by means of private bills; and although I know that the House is not with me on these propositions, I simply want to register my own protest against this class of legislation.

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Speaker, this is not a political question; the bill was introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not speak of it as a question between political parties.

Mr. BOREING. I want to say further that this bill does not retire an Army officer on pay. In February, 1901, we passed a bill providing for the appointment of certain officers from civil life. President McKinley designated Captain Hampton for one of those positions. It is true that a board did report that there was a defect in one of this man's eyes; but it is also true that two subsequent examinations, ordered by the War Department, made reports, approved by the Surgeon-General, contradicting the first report. In the meantime, however, the place to which Captain Hampton had been appointed was technically filled by a man who had served only eight days. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has personal knowledge of these matters.

Several MEMBERS. Let us vote.

Mr. BOREING. I have no disposition to occupy time in talking. I will give gentlemen an opportunity to vote, and I know that they will vote with me because they are fair.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BOREING to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN TEXAS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 17088) to create a new division of the eastern judicial district of Texas, and to provide for terms of court at Texarkana, Tex., and for a clerk for said court, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Bowie, Morris, Franklin, and Titus shall constitute a division of the eastern judicial district of Texas.

SEC. 2. That terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the said eastern district of Texas shall be held twice in each year at the city of Texarkana, and that until otherwise provided by law the judges of said courts shall fix the times at which said court shall be held at Texarkana, of which they shall make publication and give due notice.

SEC. 3. That all civil process issued against persons resident in the said counties of Bowie, Morris, Franklin, and Titus, and cognizable before the United States courts, shall be made returnable to the courts, respectively, to be held at the city of Texarkana, and all prosecutions for offenses committed in any of said counties shall be tried in the appropriate United States courts at the city of Texarkana: Provided, That no process issued or prosecution commenced or suit instituted before the passage of this bill shall be in any way affected by the provisions hereof.

SEC. 4. That the clerks of the circuit and district courts of said district shall maintain an office, in charge of themselves or a deputy, at the said city of Texarkana, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of said division.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

ALEXANDER STEWART WEBB.

Mr. DICK. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4973) to place Lieut. Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Alexander Stewart Webb on the retired list of the United States Army.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Alexander Stewart Webb, late a brigadier-general of volunteers and lieutenant-colonel and brevet major-general, United States Army, a lieutenant-colonel, and to place him on the retired list of the Army with that rank and pay, the retired list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said Alexander S. Webb.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I demand a second on this motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. DICK. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I desire to ask whether this bill has been reported by any committee of the House.

Mr. DICK. It has not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then I object to the request for unanimous consent and ask for a vote by tellers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DICK].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask to be excused from service as a teller, and that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] be appointed in my place.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will act as teller in conjunction with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DICK].

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 32.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DICK] to occupy the time allowed by the rules in favor of the motion.

Mr. DICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read in my time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he would send up the House report?

Mr. DICK. No; this is the Senate report.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is no House report on the bill, as I understand.

The Clerk read Senate Report No. 1020, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4973) to place Lieut. Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Alexander Stewart Webb on the retired list of the United States Army, have duly considered the same and submit the following report:

A similar bill was reported favorably by this committee and passed by the Senate in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and also favorably reported and passed by the Senate in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Senate Report No. 151, in the Fifty-sixth Congress, has been reconsidered, and is adopted and submitted as the report on this bill, and is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 151, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2447) to place Lieut. Col. and Bvt Maj. Gen. Alexander Stewart Webb on the retired list of the United States Army, have had the same under consideration and submit the following favorable report:

Alexander Stewart Webb served as an officer in the United States Army for over fifteen years, from July 1, 1855, to November 25, 1870. It seems scarcely necessary to submit a special report upon the bill, for the service of General Webb was of so conspicuous a nature that it requires little remark. Within six months from his graduation from the United States Military Academy, on July 1, 1855, he was on active military service with his regiment in Florida in quelling the uprisings of the Seminole Indians, there getting a foretaste of the more extensive military operations that were soon to come and in which he was to take so brilliant a part. He was a man of scholarly as well as of military attainments, being assistant professor of mathematics at the United States Military Academy for three years immediately preceding the civil war, and principal assistant professor of geography, history, and ethics at the Military Academy for several years after the war.

At all times during the war his service was of the most active and valuable nature. He was in the field in Virginia in 1861 and participated successfully in 17 different actions and battles, among which were such important ones as Mechanicsville, Antietam, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, the Wilderness, and Spottsylvania. The gallantry of his services was not without recognition. For gallant service at Gettysburg he was brevetted major and awarded a medal of honor "for distinguished personal gallantry in the battle of Gettysburg." He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel at the battle of Bristoe Station, colonel for gallant and meritorious service at the battle of Spottsylvania, brigadier-general for gallantry in the campaign ending in the surrender of Gen. R. E. Lee, major-general for gallant and meritorious service during the war, major-general volunteers for gallant and distinguished conduct at the battles of Gettysburg, Bristoe Station, the Wilderness, and Spottsylvania. At the battles of Gettysburg and Bristoe Station, in the Mine Run campaign, and at the battles of Martins Ford, the Wilderness, and Spottsylvania, he was in command, successively, of the Second Brigade of the Second Division of the Second Corps, Second Division of the Second Corps, and First Brigade of the Second Division of the Second Corps.

General Webb's conduct at Gettysburg, July 3, 1863, is particularly worthy of mention. He was in command of the Second Brigade of the Second Division of the Second Corps, and had been with the color guard of the Seventy-second Pennsylvania Volunteers, of whom every man was wounded or killed. General Webb left the color guard and went across the front of the companies to the right of the Sixty-ninth Pennsylvania, all the way between the lines, in order to direct the fire of the latter regiment upon a company of rebels who had rushed across the lower stone wall, led by the rebel general Armistead. Thus General Armistead and General Webb were both between the lines of troops and both were wounded, but by this act of gallantry General Webb kept his men up to their work until more than one-half were killed or wounded. In this action he was wounded by a bullet which struck him near the groin. General Meade, in his letter presenting a medal to General Webb, mentions this act as one not surpassed by any general on the field.

General Webb was also more severely wounded at Spottsylvania May 12, 1864, in the head. He served in various positions after the war, as shown by the appended documents, until December 31, 1870, when he was honorably discharged at his own request. He is to-day president of the College of the City of New York, and is ill much of the time from the results of his wounds, and as a consequence will be unable to continue his work. He has no other means of support. The bill was referred to the Secretary of War for remark, who referred it to the Adjutant-General, whose report is herewith printed, and will be seen to be in terms of the highest commendation. It was also referred to the Major-General Commanding the Army, whose report is herewith printed. There is also appended a statement of the military service of General Webb from the records of the Adjutant-General's Office.

This measure was also before the Senate in the Fifty-fourth Congress, during the first session of which your then committee ordered the same favorable report, and the bill was passed by the Senate.

In view of the facts above set forth and as appearing in the papers herewith printed, your committee recommend the passage of this bill without amendment.

Mr. DICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the letters which will be found at the conclusion of the report, from the Adjutant-General and from the Major-General Commanding the Army, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE.
Washington, January 8, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith Senate bill No. 1106, providing for the reappointment in the Army and retirement as lieutenant-colonel of Alexander S. Webb, late lieutenant-colonel and brevet major-general, United States Army, which has been referred to the Department by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs for information.

At the close of the war General Webb was transferred to the Forty-fourth Infantry, then known as an invalid regiment, composed of wounded and disabled officers and men. Upon the reduction of the Army in 1869, this regiment was consolidated with the Fifth Infantry, an active regiment. Many of the officers of this regiment were then retired. As General Webb was physically incapacitated for active service on the plains with the Fifth Infantry, he sought retirement. In this he was unsuccessful. He thereupon resigned, and has since been occupied in civil life.

Could the retiring board have foreseen the effects of the severe wound that he received there can be no doubt that its verdict would have been that he was incapacitated for active service.

It is held that he was justly entitled to retirement at that time. Had he then been reported incapacitated for active duty, he would have gone on the retired list with the rank and pay of brigadier-general, under the act of July 28, 1866, the actual rank he held and was exercising when wounded.

His appointment and retirement now as a lieutenant-colonel, the rank which he held when discharged from the Army, is recommended as simple justice to a gallant and disabled officer, distinguished at Bristow, in receiving Pickett's charge at Gettysburg, at Spottsylvania, and in the last campaign of the late war. I inclose a summary of his military record.

Very respectfully,

GEO. D. RUGGLES, Adjutant-General.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

[Indorsement of Major-General Commanding.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, Washington, January 20, 1896.

Respectfully returned to the honorable the Secretary of War, concurring in within report and recommendation of the Adjutant-General.

NELSON A. MILES,
Major-General Commanding.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] such time as he may desire.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have read the following report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks to have read in his time the following report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The minority of the Committee on Military Affairs have fully considered the bill (H. R. 2263) to place Alexander Stewart Webb on the retired list of the Regular Army with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and recommend that the bill do not pass.

The majority of your committee set out at length the history of service rendered by Alexander Stewart Webb, and the minority cordially indorse all that is said in commendation of General Webb's gallant service. He was educated by the Government, and rendered meritorious service from 1855 to 1869. War records say: "On November 25, 1870, he requested to be discharged the military service under the provisions of section 3, act of July 15, 1870, to take effect December 31, 1870, and was honorably discharged accordingly."

He voluntarily surrendered his commission as an officer of the Regular Army. Section 3 of the act of July 15, 1870, provides—

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, honorably to discharge from the service of the United States officers of the Army who may apply therefor on or before the 1st day of January next; and such officers so discharged under the provisions of this act shall be entitled to receive, in addition to the pay and allowances due them at the date of their discharge, one year's pay and allowances."

General Webb received the full one year's extra pay. Before he tendered his resignation he was elected president of the City College of the city of New York. The position carried with it a salary of $7,500 a year, together with a home free of rent, making his salary equal to at least $9,000 a year.

General Webb has held this office for more than a quarter of a century. It is true he applied for retirement before sending in his resignation, but the board, composed of Regular Army officers, his comrades and associates, refused him retirement and ordered him to rejoin his regiment. The minority of your committee are constrained to believe that if General Webb had not been elected to and accepted the position of president of the college he would have obeyed the order of the board. As a good soldier, educated at the expense of the Government, he should have obeyed the order. If true, as now claimed, that the board erred in not retiring General Webb, a very short time in active service would have demonstrated this, and certainly his associates in the Army would have done justice by retiring him. We believe the fact that General Webb has been at the head of a great institution of learning for more than a quarter of a century vindicates the judgment of the retiring board.

There were more than 500 officers retired under the same laws General Webb took advantage of. Each one of them has the same right to ask Congress to now place him on the retired list. A large number of these officers were really forced out of the service by the reduction of 20 regiments. The larger part of them are poor men and have battled for the bare necessaries of life since leaving the Army. Many of them have applied to Congress year after year for restoration and retirement, and asked in vain. To refuse these gallant men, most of them volunteer officers who were commissioned in the Regular Army at the close of the war as a recognition of gallant conduct on the field of battle, and grant this favor to General Webb is so manifestly unjust that the minority of your committee can not consent to it. We ask the Congress to consider the enormous expense which must result from such legislation. To carry it out to its legitimate conclusion would make the retired list of the Army cost the people more each year than the active list now costs.

General Webb has received since his resignation over $200,000 in salary, and if we add allowance in the way of house rent in New York City, even this amount will be largely increased. Certainly the plea of poverty can not be set up in this case and denied in the hundreds of other cases where the struggle for life has taxed to the uttermost the officers thrown out of the Army by the reorganization act of 1870.

J. A. T. HULL.
JOHN C. TARSNEY.
B. F. MARSH.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this report is a complete answer to all that has been said by the gentleman on the other side. This officer was ordered to duty in 1870. He was examined by a board of surgeons and was decided by them to be capable of performing that service. Before that time, however, it seems he was elected president of some college in New York, and rather than go and serve in the Army, he resigned. Now he applies to Congress to place him upon the retired list as a lieutenant-colonel. I am informed by gentlemen who seem to know what they are talking about that he has already been retired by this college and draws a salary of some $5,000 a year. It does seem to me that if there is any case where we ought to call a halt in this retiring business, it is right here. I yield the balance of my time back to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this case is probably a little more glaring than the others, but the same principle is involved. Here is a man that the Army board has refused to retire. He resigned because he wanted to seek private employment, just like the other cases. He got the private employment, and according to the report of the committee in the Fifty-fourth Congress when this case was up before, it would seem that he got very remunerative employment, and for that reason refused to join his regiment, sending his resignation in to the President. It was accepted, and now he asks us to put him on the retired list. This is a dangerous class of legislation; it is a class of legislation that should not be adopted. We seek to exercise an Executive function and by it to take this man out of civil life because, regardless of his past record, he is in civil life to-day. He is in civil life because he desired to go into civil life and sent his resignation to the President. Now he comes before Congress, and has been here before—for other Congresses have turned this case down—and asks us to put him on the retired list as a lieutenant-colonel on three-quarters pay. I think the time has come when this class of legislation should be stopped, and I again offer my protest. I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having failed to vote in favor of suspending the rules, the motion was lost.

JOHN WALTON ROSS.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 6104) to restore to the active list of the Navy the name of John Walton Ross, without amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint John Walton Ross, surgeon, United States Navy, retired, to the active list of the Navy as a medical director (an additional number), not in line of promotion, and to retain his present longevity (from the date of his original commission as surgeon in the Navy), said officer having tendered his services to the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the person for whose restoration this bill has been introduced, Dr. John Walton Ross, entered the service of the Government in 1870 and served therein with fidelity for twenty-four years, about one-half of the time at sea and the other half on shore. In 1894, his eyes having gotten into bad condition, a medical board recommended that he be placed on the retired list. In 1898, at the outbreak of the Spanish-American war, he volunteered and his services were accepted by the Navy Department. He served that Department in the South until February, as I recollect, or the spring of 1902, when he was relieved.

The services of this man have been distinguished, full of merit, and have been remarkable. They have been recognized by every official of the Government who has had any connection therewith. The report shows that he served in the yellow-fever infected districts of the United States, and by reason thereof his eyes were injured. This bill is recommended by the Surgeon-General of the Navy, by the Bureau of Navigation, and by the Secretary of the Navy. He is a valuable officer, having served the Government twenty-eight years, twenty-four as a regular surgeon and four as a volunteer. The Surgeon-General of the Navy urgently requests that he may be restored to the active list. This action will interfere with the promotion of no one, as this bill provides that the number which he shall receive will be an additional one. As near as we can learn Dr. Ross is perhaps 56 or 57 years of age. Had he remained in the service he would have been promoted at this time to the grade to which this House is asked to restore him.

I will say to my friend from Alabama that the Committee on Naval Affairs considered this case and everybody voted in favor of restoring this man to the active list, that the Government might have the benefit of his skill. I will further say to the gentleman from Alabama that the Department stands greatly in need of surgeons, and this is considered a wise and economical thing to do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvana. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do I understand that this is a bill not to retire an officer but to restore an officer to duty who has already been in the Army and is now on the retired list?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. That is correct. I will say to my friend that since Dr. Ross has been put on the retired list his eyesight has been restored, and in the judgment of the medical officers of the Navy he is competent to perform active duty, and they greatly desire the benefit of his services.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What is his age?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Fifty-six or fifty-seven. He has six or seven years of active service yet to perform.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DINSMORE. What was the rank of this officer when he was retired?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. He was at the head of the surgeons' list, and this gives one higher grade than he then had; a grade he would have reached had he continued in the service.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does this propose to give him a grade higher than the grade he already had?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. One grade higher than the grade he had at the time he was retired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. What was his grade when he was retired?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. He was at the head of the surgeons' list when he was retired, and this makes him a medical director, the grade he would have reached had he continued on the active list.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to say that when I asked for a second on this bill I supposed it was another retirement bill; but I see it is a bill to allow an officer to return to duty from the retired list, and I have no objection to the passage of a bill of that kind.

The question being taken on the motion, and two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

CAPT. JAMES J. HORNBROOK AND OTHERS.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 5381) to correct errors in dates of original appointments of Capt. James J. Hornbrook and others.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That with a view to correct errors in dates of original appointments, upon their graduation from the United States Military Academy, the President is hereby authorized to cause the names of Capts. James J. Hornbrook, William F. Clark, and Samuel G. Jones, of the cavalry, to appear upon the lineal list of captains of cavalry, in the order above named, next below that of Capt. Frank M. Caldwell.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

HENRY G. ROGERS.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the rules be suspended and the bill (S. 1471) for the relief of Henry G. Rogers be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Henry G. Rogers, late first sergeant of Company B, Twenty-fourth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, shall be held and considered commissioned a second lieutenant in said regiment from January 2, 1864, with rank from November 25, 1863, and to have been discharged as such lieutenant January 27, 1864: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have a second on this bill.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OTJEN] for the bill and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] against it.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Speaker, the sole object of this bill is to permit Mr. Rogers to be considered as having been commissioned, so that he may join the Loyal Legion. He is a man of very excellent standing and is anxious to join the Loyal Legion, and they are anxious to have him. This bill does not involve the Government in one dollar of expense. It provides that no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue on account of the bill. It will not involve the Government in any additional pension, because he is already drawing a twelve-dollar pension for wounds which he received while a soldier.

This commission would be dated from November 25, 1863, and the wounds for which he is pensioned he received in September, 1863, so that it would not involve the Government in any expense whatever. Mr. Rogers has a very excellent record. He received a wound in the battle of Perryville, on October 8, 1862, and at the battle of Stone River, later, he received two wounds. At the battle of Chickamauga, September 19 and 20, 1863, he received a wound through the right arm, and later on, in the same battle, received four additional wounds, which absolutely disabled him. He lay upon the battlefield three days without his wounds being attended to, and I hope the gentlemen will have no further objection to the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to ask the gentleman what is the history of this man. I have not been able to hear a word. Was he ever an officer?

Mr. OTJEN. He was a sergeant and was commissioned a second lieutenant, but was not mustered. It is only to muster him, so he may join the Loyal Legion. It will not involve the Government in a dollar of expense.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How was he commissioned—by whom?

Mr. OTJEN. By the governor of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why was he not mustered in?

Mr. OTJEN. Because the company had been reduced below the minimum.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It was a recruiting commission, issued to a sergeant?

Mr. OTJEN. No, sir; I think not; but a regular commission as second lieutenant.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What was the number of the regiment?

Mr. OTJEN. I do not remember his regiment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There are thousands, at least, of these cases.

Mr. OTJEN. He served in the Twenty-fourth Wisconsin Volunteer Regiment. He has a very excellent record.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

TABLETS AT GETTYSBURG FOR REGULAR ARMY FORCES.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 7 as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7) authorizing the Secretary of War to cause to be erected monuments and markers on the battlefield of Gettysburg, Pa., to commemorate the valorous deeds of certain regiments and batteries of the United States Army.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Gettysburg National Park Commission be, and hereby are, authorized and directed, under the supervision of the Secretary of War, to erect such monuments and markers of granite and bronze upon the battlefield of Gettysburg, in the State of Pennsylvania, as will fittingly designate the positions, indicate the movements, and commemorate the valorous services of the following batteries and regiments of United States Regulars upon the battlefield: Batteries E, G, H, I, and K, First United States Artillery; A, B, D, G, L, and M, Second United States Artillery; C, F, and K, Third United States Artillery; A, B, C, F, G, and K, Fourth United States Artillery; C, D, F, I, and K, Fifth United States Artillery; Second, Third, Fourth, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Tenth, Eleventh, Twelfth, Fourteenth, and Seventeenth Regiments of United States Infantry; First, Second, Fifth, and Sixth Regiments of Cavalry; and United States Engineers Detachment.

The Secretary of War shall, so far as practicable, procure the appointment of committees of the survivors of these regiments and batteries, with whom the said Commission shall consult, and, with the approval of the Secretary of War, determine the designs and positions of said monuments and markers and the inscriptions they shall bear, and for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, $61,500 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, and the disbursements under this act shall be made on the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I will simply state for the information of the House that I was unanimously instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report this bill with a favorable recommendation, and to seek the earliest parliamentary opportunity to secure its passage. The object of the bill is to remedy a defect of long standing on the part of the National Government, it having failed to do what the States have done at their own expense in the erection of monuments and tablets commemorating the gallant deeds of volunteer forces on the field at Gettysburg. Strange as it may seem, when every organization designated by the States have erected their tablets, the Government has never placed a monument or tablet showing the positions of the Regular Army. That is the whole object of this bill. It appropriates the necessary money and authorizes the Secretary of War, in conjunction with the National Park Association, to erect these tablets. I feel so sure that it must commend itself to the good judgment of the House that I do not believe it is necessary to say anything more.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

REGULATING THE PRACTICE OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass without amendment the bill H. R. 15986.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15986) regulating the practice of medicine and surgery in the Indian Territory.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter no person shall practice medicine and surgery, or either, as a profession in the Indian Territory without first being registered as a physician and surgeon, or either, in the office of the clerk in the district in which he or she offers to practice.

SEC. 2. That each district clerk in the Indian Territory shall keep in his office a well-bound book, in which he shall register the names of all such persons as shall be lawfully qualified, as hereinafter provided, and who shall apply for registration as physicians and surgeons, or either, with the date of such registration.

SEC. 3. SEC. 4. That immediately after the passage of this act the United States judge of each district in the Indian Territory shall appoint for his district a board of medical examiners, consisting of three persons, who shall be citizens of the district and learned in the science of medicine and surgery, of good moral character, graduates of some reputable medical college recognized by either of the American medical college associations, and who shall thereafter be duly registered under this act, who shall hold their office for a period of four years, or until their successors are duly appointed and qualified; and should a vacancy occur in any of said boards at any time, the same shall be filled by appointment made by the United States judge of the district in which the vacancy occurs.

SEC. 5. That the members of said board shall, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, take the official oath required to be taken by officers of the Indian Territory.

SEC. 6. That at the first meeting of the members of such boards, after they shall have been appointed, preparatory to the transaction of business assigned them under this act, they shall organize by electing one of their members as president and another as secretary.

SEC. 7. That the regular meetings of each board shall be held quarterly at the court-house of that district on the first Monday in January, April, July, and October in each year, and when so assembled said board shall faithfully and impartially examine all such persons as shall appear before them for that purpose touching their qualifications to practice medicine and surgery, or either, and all such persons as shall satisfy such board of examiners, or a majority of them, that he or she is of good moral character and duly qualified in knowledge and capacity to practice medicine and surgery, or either, shall receive from such board a certificate of qualification as physician and surgeon, or either, as the case may be, which certificate shall entitle such person to registration under the provisions of sections 2 and 3: Provided further, That no person desiring to practice medicine under this act shall be excluded therefrom on account of any particular system or school of medicine that he or she may desire to practice.

SEC. 8. That any person desiring to be examined at any other time than the regular quarterly meeting shall notify the president of the board of such desire, whose duty it shall be to assemble the board as soon as practicable and examine such applicant.

SEC. 9. That the district clerk shall give to every person registered under this act a certificate of registration over his signature and official seal, and such certificate shall authorize any such person to practice as physician or surgeon, or both, as the case may be, in any district in the Indian Territory, provided he or she registers said certificate with the district clerk in the district in which he or she resides.

SEC. 10. That the clerk shall receive as his fee for all services required of him under this act in each case the sum of $1.50.

SEC. 11. That any two members of said board shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of all such business as shall come before it, and each applicant for examination shall pay in advance to the secretary, to be divided equally among the members of such board, the sum of $10, which shall be their only compensation.

SEC. 12. That all physicians and surgeons holding diplomas desiring to practice the science of medicine and surgery in the Indian Territory shall submit the same to the board of examiners for the district in which they desire to practice for examination and approval, for which said applicant shall pay a fee of $1 to said board, and upon approval by said board of said diploma shall not be required to undergo the examination herein provided for; and said board shall issue to said applicant a certificate of approval, which certificate shall be registered in the clerk's office for the district in which said board holds jurisdiction.

SEC. 14. That any person who shall hereafter engage in the practice of medicine and surgery, or either, in the Indian Territory, in violation of the requirements of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction in any court having jurisdiction thereof under the laws of the United States governing the practice of medicine and surgery in the Indian Territory shall be fined in any sum not less than $25 and more than $100. And each day said physician or surgeon shall practice medicine or surgery without being registered as hereinbefore required shall be deemed a separate offense.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Indian Affairs. The United States judge of that district has written a letter recommending the passage of the bill. There has been no objection to it from any source. There are about 300,000, or probably more, white persons in that Territory and nearly 100,000 Indians. There are no laws in the Indian Territory whatever regulating the practice of medicine and surgery. It has therefore become a breeding ground for a great many quacks, and the people of this Territory are now, by this bill, asking for this relief. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of this bill. Mr. Speaker, I will print as part of my remarks the report made by me on this bill:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R 15986) regulating the practice of medicine and surgery in the Indian Territory, beg leave to submit the following report, and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment:

This is a bill enacting that hereafter no person shall practice medicine and surgery, or either, as a profession in the Indian Territory without first being registered as a physician and surgeon, or either, in the office of the clerk in the district in which he or she offers to practice.

The bill provides that the United States judge of each district in that Territory shall appoint in his district a board of medical examiners consisting of three graduates of some reputable medical college recognized by either of the American medical college associations. This board holds office for four years.

They are required to examine and grant certificates of qualification to practice medicine to all persons of good moral character and duly qualified in knowledge and capacity to practice medicine and surgery in the Indian Territory, and no person shall be excluded from registration on account of having studied any particular school of medicine. Every applicant for registration shall pay to the board in advance a fee of $10, which shall be equally divided among the board, and this shall be their only compensation. Each applicant also shall pay $1.50 to the clerk for recording his certificate. This law will not cost the Government anything.

Physicians holding diplomas from reputable medical colleges shall pay a fee of $1 to the board and shall be entitled to a certificate of approval without being required to undergo an examination.

The necessity for this legislation arises from the fact that any person, however ignorant, is now permitted to practice medicine in the Indian Territory, and as a result the Indian Territory is filled with many disreputable and ignorant quack doctors, who prey upon an unprotected people. This bill will, if it becomes a law, furnish the desired legal protection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds being in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

THANKS OF CONGRESS TO REAR-ADMIRAL LOUIS KEMPFF.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution No. 8.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution No. 8, tendering the thanks of Congress to Rear-Admiral Louis Kempff, United States Navy, for meritorious conduct at Taku, China.

Resolved, etc., That the thanks of Congress be, and they are hereby, tendered to Rear-Admiral Louis Kempff, commanding the Asiatic Squadron, for the wisdom displayed by him in refusing to join the allied forces in the bombardment of the forts at Taku, China.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, the facts upon which that resolution is based are common property, known all over the world. This is unanimously reported from the committee. The resolution was not considered before Admiral Dewey had been consulted, and that great sailor said that it was merited, and thrice merited. It took as great character, resolution, and courage to refuse to fight in such a grave and difficult crisis as it did to fight for this was in view of easy victory, with six great allies against one weak power. The wisdom and the patriotism of Admiral Kempff in refusing to join the allies in suddenly beginning war upon the Chinese Government were immediately vindicated, for by the action of the allies in attacking Taku the whole Chinese nation was instantly inflamed—not merely the Boxer rebels. Their Government was exasperated.

Our minister, with all the other foreign representatives, was involved in the whirlwind of threatened destruction at Pekin. Many thousands of Christians were slain. Had the other powers whose fleets attacked the fort at Taku followed the wise rule of the strong, calm American sailor who said, "Let no American gun or American vessel be used to make war upon a people or bombard the fort of a government with which we are not at war," and had they confined themselves to the protection of their citizens, as he did to the defense of American life and property, the bloody and dreadful scenes at Pekin might have been far different. Even after those scenes the Chinese showed confidence in our Government alone—through us gave out the first news of the besieged, agreed to the open-door policy, and modified the indemnity, always trusting our sincerity. Our course toward their Government had been for more than fifty years fair, without greed to rob them of provinces or oppress them. John Russell Young, who, many of you know, was long our minister there, told me that no other power in the world had the ear and the confidence of the Chinese Government as had the United States, because our Government had always been self-restraining, disinterested, and fair minded, as here illustrated in the conduct of Admiral Kempff.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House in reciting the history of his part in that memorable 18th of June, 1900, so widely known to all readers, which has been discussed by the eminent publicists of the day, and has merited and received eulogy from so many writers in all countries.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the joint resolution was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS CUMBERLAND RIVER NEAR CARTHAGE, TENN.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, without amendments: H. R. 16909, to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Carthage, Tenn.," approved March 2, 1901.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Carthage, Tenn.," approved March 2, 1901, be, and the same is hereby, revived and declared to be in full force and effect, and that section 5 of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows: "That this act shall be null and void if said bridge is not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the 1st day of April, 1903."

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

BRIG. GEN. H. C. MERRIAM.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 5891) to authorize the President to appoint Brig. Gen. H. C. Merriam to the grade of major-general in the United States Army and place him on the retired list, without amendments.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, with the advice and consent of the Senate, Brig. Gen. H. C. Merriam to the grade of major-general in the United States Army and place him on the retired list.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. ESCH. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, this bill is to authorize the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Gen. H. C. Merriam a major-general on the retired list. General Merriam entered the service in 1862 as captain in the Twentieth Maine Infantry. He served with distinction during the rebellion. He was twice brevetted for gallantry on the field, and on one occasion was awarded a medal of honor by Congress for leading charge on Fort Blakely, near Mobile. After the war he was made a major in the regular service and was assigned to the southwest territory, and engaged int he Apache campaign. After that he was assigned to service along the border of the Rio Grande in Texas, and there so distinguished himself as to receive the merited praise of his superior officer. After that he was assigned to duty in the Department of Columbia, and was afterwards engaged in the Nez Perce campaign in the Northwest. During that service he won the confidence of the inhabitants of that section, and also the commendation of his superior officers.

Since that time he has been engaged in the Department of Colorado and Missouri. Since 1897 he has been made a brigadier-general, and was assigned to the Department of Colorado, and during a portion of that time had also a great portion of the district of Missouri under his charge, a command worthy of a major-general's rank. In 1898 he was made a major-general of volunteers and assigned to the Pacific, and while there performed the arduous duties of preparing and fitting out the expedition to the Philippine Islands, the first expedition under General Anderson and the second under Maj. Gen. Wesley Merritt. So thorough and faithful were his services in the preparation of this expedition that he received the praise of General Merritt, likewise the commendation of the President.

He has served as a brigadier since 1897. His retirement was in November, 1901.

Prior to his retirement he had been promised an increase of rank and an appointment to the rank of major-general. That promise was made by the President to several generals of the Army. It was made to General Bates, and also to Senator FRYE, and to the Secretary of War, and was made to General MacArthur a few days before the President was shot at Buffalo.

After that tragedy the time for retirement came by operation of law, and he was retired with the rank of brigadier-general and holds that rank to-day. In view of the distinguished services of this officer, in view of the commendation he has received at the hands of every superior officer, of the commendation received at the hands of the President of the United States and of the Congress, the Committee on Military Affairs of the House unanimously recommend the passage of the bill. It has likewise been recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The question on the passage of the bill was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS BOGUE CHITTO, LOUISIANA.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 16646) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Bogue Chitto, in the State of Louisiana, with amendment.

The Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

That authority is hereby granted, and consent is hereby given, for the building of a wagon and foot bridge across Bogue Chitto River, in the parish of St. Tammany, State of Louisiana, by the police jury of said parish: Provided, That the plans and location for such bridge shall be first approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That said bridge shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, and shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post roads in the United States; and no charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States. Equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal-telegraph purposes, and any changes in said bridge which the Secretary of War may hereafter require and order, in the interest of navigation, shall be promptly made by the said police jury without expense to the United States.

SEC. 3. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The question on the passage of the bill was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

EXTERMINATION OF FUR-BEARING ANIMALS IN ALASKA.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 13387) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska, and for other purposes," with amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas the records of the State and Treasury Departments up to date show conclusively that the regulations of the Bering Sea tribunal, made at Paris, August 16, 1893, for the preservation and protection of the fur-seal herds of Alaska, have utterly failed to so protect and preserve these herds from indecent killing and ruinous diminution of life after seven years of faithful enforcement; and

Whereas the negotiations undertaken by the Jordan-Thompson commission in 1896 and 1897 to alter and amend the said useless regulations of the Bering Sea tribunal have also ended in complete failure to afford the slightest relief; and

Whereas the Government of the United States is reduced, by the failure of these official negotiations aforesaid, to the painful position of being obliged to breed and protect annually some 50,000 female seals on the seal islands of Alaska for alien hunters to slaughter at sea, our people being absolutely shut out from that killing by special act of Congress; and

Whereas this killing of 20,000 to 30,000 mother seals at sea by alien hunters every year entails the cruel and indecent starvation to death on the islands of 15,000 to 25,000 young or pup seals every September and October; and

Whereas this ruin of the fur-seal industry of the United States in Alaskan waters by alien hunters compels the Government to support the native inhabitants of the seal islands by annual appropriations from the public Treasury; to keep a resident staff of Treasury agents on the said islands, and order the sailing and idle patrol service of four and five revenue-marine cutters into Alaskan waters from May to the end of October, annually; and

Whereas the cruel and improper condition of affairs on the seal islands of Alaska will continue for an indefinite period, unless Congress puts an end to it: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to negotiate and conclude negotiations with the Government of Great Britain for a review of the condition of affairs on the fur-seal rookeries of the Pribilof Islands, Bering Sea, Alaska, said review to determine what further regulations shall be ordered, if any can be devised, which will restore and preserve the fur-seal industry of Alaska for the good of all mankind and abate the shameful order of killing now permitted and conducted.

SEC. 2. That pending the investigation and review of said condition of affairs the President of the United States is hereby authorized to conclude and proclaim a modus vivendi with the Government of Great Britain whereby the killing of any or all fur seals on the land or in the sea by the subjects of the respective Governments shall be suspended and entirely prohibited, except a few hundred young male seals annually on the islands of St. Paul and St. George, for natives' food, and said modus vivendi shall remain in force and binding until it is abrogated by a mutual agreement to that end by the United States and Great Britain.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of the act approved April 6, 1894, providing punishment by fine, imprisonment, and forfeiture of vessels for violation of the articles of the award of the Bering Sea tribunal of arbitration are hereby made applicable to all violations of the modus vivendi herein provided for, and it shall be the duty of the President to make known by proclamation the provisions of said modus vivendi.

SEC. 4. That all expenses incident to said review, investigation, acquisition of authentic data, and preparation of the report of the case of the United States, ordered and approved by the President, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, which amount is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 5. That if the modus vivendi authorized by section 2 of this act be not concluded, and regulations under the same, effectual in the judgment of the President for preserving the Alaskan seal herd, be not put into operation before the opening of the pelagic sealing season of 1903, then the Secretary of the Treasury may, with the approval of the President, except as hereinafter provided, take and kill each and every fur seal, male and female, found on the Pribilof Islands; but that not less than 10,000 female seals and 1,000 male seals shall be left alive thereon. The skins of said seals so killed shall be sold by him to the best advantage with regard to time and place of sale as he may elect, and the proceeds thereof covered into the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That all needful expenses incident to the killing of said seals, preservation and transportation of skins, erection of necessary buildings, employment of labor, care of the seal islands and Pribilof natives incurred by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be paid by him out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, which amount is hereby appropriated: Provided, also, That nothing in the Revised Statutes, sections numbered 1960 and 1961 contained therein, shall prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from exercising the authority herein conferred upon him to take and kill said seals, but otherwise said sections shall remain in full force and operation.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers on this question the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN].

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 25.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] in support of this motion, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] in opposition.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration proposes to authorize the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with the Government of Great Britain for a review of the Bering Sea regulations in respect to the killing of fur seal and for a modus vivendi, suspending entirely or prohibiting the killing of seal either on land or sea for a period of time to be mutually agreed upon, or until the regulations have been reviewed and modified so as to prevent the slaughter of the seal herd of Alaska, as it is at present going on. This in a modified form is the same bill that was reported by the Ways and Means Committee of this House in the Fifty-fourth Congress, and which passed the House at that time by unanimous consent.

It was reported from the committee to that Congress by the late Nelson Dingley, jr., chairman of the committee. The Senate failed to pass it, and consequently the negotiations were not authorized, and the executive department of the Government could do nothing; and in the meantime the slaughter of the Alaska fur-seal herd by the pelagic hunters has been going on. In 1874 this herd numbered more than 4,000,000; to-day, as I am informed by the last survey, the herd does not exceed 200,000. That the House may know the extent to which it has been reduced, and the limit of time when it will be entirely exterminated, I need only say that four-fifths of the seal killed last year by the North American Commercial Company, that has the contract or lease with the Government for the killing of seal on the Pribilof Islands, were seals only 1 year old, or what are known as "eye plasters."

In reporting this bill to the House in the Fifty-fourth Congress, Mr. Dingley, in a very brief report, summed up the whole situation when he said:

> The necessity for this course arises from the fact that the Alaskan fur-seal herd is being rapidly exterminated by pelagic sealing vessels—mainly Canadian—which follow the seal herd as it moves along our Pacific coast in the spring and enter Bering Sea at the end of the close season, in August, when they are free under the ineffectual regulations adopted by the Paris tribunal to use the spear—more deadly than the shotgun—in killing, outside of the 60-mile zone, the seals that frequent these waters in pursuit of food. As these seals are mainly females that have brought forth their young on the Pribilof Islands, the killing of the mother seals results in the starvation of the young upon the land and the inevitable rapid extinction of the fur-seal herd.

Let me say here that we have on the floor of this House a member from Illinois [Mr. CROWLEY] who was a special agent of the Treasury Department on the Pribilof Islands in 1895, who himself assisted in the counting of 30,000 seal pups that were starved by reason of their mothers having been exterminated when in the open sea beyond the 6-mile zone in search of food to maintain themselves and their young.

Mr. Dingley continues:

> The rapidity of the decline of the valuable herds which annually resorted to the Pribilof Islands of Alaska, mainly on account of pelagic sealing, will be seen when it appears that in 1874 this herd numbered about 4,633,000. In 1890 the herd had been reduced to 1,039,000, and at the close of the season in 1895 to about 175,500—44,000 seals, mostly females, having been killed during the last season by pelagic sealers and about 30,000 pups having died of starvation in consequence of the killing of the mother seals.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the report of our minister to Japan shows that in 1901 there were fitted out at Yokohama four sailing vessels that sailed under the Japanese flag; three of them navigated by Americans, took seals on the American side in Bering Sea, and that during the year 1902 a number of Japanese sealers would visit Bering Sea. Japan not being a party to the Paris agreement, the pelagic hunter sailing under the Japanese flag may go to within 3 miles of the Pribilof Islands. And the commander of the revenue cutter Manning, in a report to the Department, which I have here, says that he boarded two vessels which were fitted out at Yokohama and were hunting and killing fur seal within the 6-mile zone; and that he was informed that in that year 18 vessels were fitted out at Yokohama for the purpose of engaging in seal fishing in the Alaskan waters. For the information of the House I will read from the last annual report of the supervising special agent of the Treasury Department what our special agent in Alaska says:

> In August last the commander of the revenue cutter Manning boarded in Bering Sea two sealing vessels sailing under the Japanese flag, with seals on board, and complete sealing outfits of boats and fire-arms. One of them stated that 18 sealers had cleared from Yokohama for Bering Sea. In September last the same officer boarded four Japanese sealers in the vicinity of the 60-mile zone around the Pribilof Islands, in which pelagic sealing is prohibited to American and British sealers by the terms of the Paris award. The commander of the Manning pertinently remarks that "to one on the grounds, seeing the workings of the present method of patrol and the results, it appears ludicrous for the American and British Governments to be making such efforts to prevent their own sealers from gathering in the seals, thus protecting the herd that the Japanese may come in and secure the cream of the business."
> This is a matter of grave importance to the Pribilof herd, and it would seem that, if no insistence is made regarding the other features of the Paris arbitration, the one requirement of the award, the preservation of the 60-mile limit, should be enforced against all comers. Even if this Government has no property right in the seals, which is not granted, it would seem the proper act of a civilized nation to preserve the 60-mile zone free from hunting, so that the female seals may safely gather food for their young on the rookeries before becoming targets for the guns and spears of the hunters.

Now, if we can put a stop to this butchery by the pelagic hunter, as it is carried on there to-day, we have by our treaty with Japan and Russia an agreement that as soon as the pelagic hunter of Great Britain ceases his work this provision of the treaty will become operative, and Japan and Russia will likewise cease their operation and the killing of seal in the open sea, as they are doing now.

Now, the one and only objection that has ever been made to this bill, and it was not raised when the bill was before the House in the Fifty-fourth Congress, is that provision which says that in the event Great Britain refuses to enter into negotiations with us for the purpose of so amending the regulations as to insure the preservation and protection of that herd then one of two things must follow—either the herd will be exterminated by the pelagic sealer or we will, in the discretion of the President, step in and take our own property; but in the event that discretion is exercised it must be exercised so as to preserve the species by allowing to remain on these islands 10,000 female seals and 1,000 male seals.

So that if Great Britain refuses to join with us for the preservation of practically the only fur-seal herd in the world by so modifying the present impotent regulations as to prevent the slaughter of that herd, then and only in the event of such failure or refusal can this authority be exercised. And why should it not be exercised? If we take the herd or what remains it will be taken in a decent, humane way, and we will get the benefit. If we do not take it the pelagic hunter will be slaughtering the females in open sea and starving their young on the Pribilof Islands. In that case the benefit will inure wholly to the pelagic hunter, and it is only in that remote contingency that this discretionary authority is vested in the President of the United States. Whether it would ever be recognized or not I do not know, but I have no doubt that in that case its exercise would be justified, and knowing this it might bring about a settlement of this much vexed question. In regard to this particular provision of the bill, which was contained in the bill reported by Mr. Dingley, he says:

> It is believed that it is Canada that is standing in the way and holding back Great Britain from cooperating with us in the preservation of the seal herd, and that when Canada sees that we propose to take summary measures to end not only the inhumanity that consigns thousands of young seals to slow starvation, but also the farce by which we are expending large sums of money to police Bering Sea practically to aid her pelagic sealers in the work of exterminating seals, she will no longer endeavor to prevent England from uniting with us in efficient measures to save the seal herds to the world.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, accompanying the report on this bill were filed the views of the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means, consisting of the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MCCALL, our late friend the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. Russell, the gentleman from California, Mr. METCALF, the gentleman from Nevada, Mr. NEWLANDS, and myself. We recognize quite as well as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] the necessity that exists for the preservation of the Alaskan seal herd from the pelagic hunter. We realize quite as much as does he the cruelty of pelagic sealing.

As far as the first four sections of the bill are concerned, we have no objection, for they are designed to confer upon the President an authority which he already possesses under the treaty-making power of the Constitution. They serve as a polite parliamentary remainder that he should be up and doing; that he should at least make some effort to bring about a cessation of the cruel practice of which Great Britain is guilty. To section 5 of the bill we are unalterably opposed. It either means nothing at all or else it means that, failing to renew negotiations with Great Britain, failing to establish a modus vivendi by which pelagic sealing shall be stopped, the Secretary of the Treasury will, under the direction of the President, kill off all the Alaskan seal herd with the exception of 10,000 cows and 1,000 bulls.

It is probable that the Aleuts, of whom there are 300 living on the Pribilof Islands, will eat the get and more than the get of the remaining 11,000 seals, so that if section 5 goes into effect it will be only a question of time when the whole seal herd will be destroyed. Upon this subject President David Starr Jordan, of Leland Stanford University, formerly commissioner in charge of our fur-seal investigations in 1896 and 1897, says, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means:

As a stroke of diplomacy the threat might be of value; how much would remain to be seen. As such I would not oppose it. If, however, it is seriously considered as a line of policy, it is simply monstrous. It would be a confession of weakness, of inability to meet England in diplomacy. It would bring upon us the odium which now properly rests with Great Britain for her unwillingness to abolish the destructive agency of pelagic sealing. It would needlessly destroy the most valuable and most interesting marine animal yet left. * * * The idea is a monstrous one. * * * In any event I trust that the idea of slaughtering the animals ourselves may never be seriously considered. It is preposterous.

Upon a similar proposition—that of killing all the herd upon the islands—Senator MORGAN of Alabama made a minority report to the Senate on April 16, 1896. Senator MORGAN was one of the two arbitrators upon the Paris tribunal, selected by the United States. He declared that the provision to authorize the destruction of the seals by our Government proposed—to add to the enemies of the fur seals on our islands the authorized agents and officers of the United States. * * * This (their destruction) can only be done while they are virtually prisoners, driven to the islands by the necessities of existence, which they can no more avoid than wrecked mariners could avoid taking shelter there from a tempest in Bering Sea.

Senator MORGAN also took the ground that Great Britain would have a right to insist that such a provision in law would be "a violation of the treaty rights of that Government in respect to the fur seals."

Senator John Sherman, of Ohio, at the same time, expressed his views in a minority report, as follows:

I place my opposition to this bill upon the ground that the proposed destruction of the seals by the United States is a cruel act, not to be justified even though the same result may be brought about by pelagic sealing. The measure proposed is dictated by apparent spite, because some other power will destroy them in another way. It is better to take the chances that Great Britain will give to the subject kinder and more generous treatment and join with the United States in making new regulations to preserve seal life.

The Secretary of the Treasury, the Hon. L. M. Shaw, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, dated February 7, 1902, says:

With reference to the proposition that all seals on the islands be killed and the skins sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, it is suggested that such action would be an admission that the position of this Government in the diplomatic controversy which has been for years and is now pending concerning the right of this Government to protect the seal life from wanton destruction is untenable. It would also involve serious loss of revenue, arbitrarily annul existing contracts, and invite criticism for the sanctioning of an act which might properly be termed barbarous.

I desire to state that the revenue from 1870 to date derived from the seal islands, exclusive of all expenses connected therewith, amounts to over $5,000,000. * * *

To destroy the source from which the Government may continue to derive a large sum per annum, even if pelagic sealing is not terminated, would, in my judgment, be unwise.

So much for those who are opposed to this proposal. The only person claiming to be an authority upon seal life who favored section 5 before the committee is a certain Mr. Henry W. Elliott, formerly an employee of the Smithsonian Institution and once a special commissioner of the United States for the purpose of investigating conditions of seal life. During the oral argument of Sir Charles Russell before the Paris tribunal on the fur-seal question, in 1893, Mr. Carter, of counsel for the United States, said, in reference to Mr. Elliott:

We have not referred to it ourselves—

That is, to Mr. Elliott's report—in our case. We have carefully avoided everything of Mr. Elliott's.

The PRESIDENT. Is there any reason why the scientific authority of Mr. Elliott should be considered as not valuable?

Mr. CARTER. We totally distrust him and have carefully avoided him. He is a great favorite on the other side—

That is, the British side.

Further on Mr. Carter, still speaking of Mr. Elliott, said:

Oh, we distrust him, because we suppose that he is an untrustworthy observer, a man who is given to theories and not to an accurate dealing with facts. It is on this ground that we distrust him. He is not a man from whom we conceive the truth can be well and suitably gathered.

Mr. Phelps, also of counsel for the United States, in his argument before the same tribunal, makes this statement about Mr. Elliott:

The eminent jurist, Judge Swan, who throws some light upon the subject, and Professor Elliott came into violent collision. Judge Swan proceeds to refute all Elliott's science, depreciate his ability, and denounce his motives; and if you take Swan's judicial estimate of the man he would disappear from the case at once.

And further on:

What was the trouble? Mr. Elliott had been connected, as Judge Swan said—and I think he told the truth, probably; it would not be respectful to assume of any man with the title of judge that he would say anything else—that Mr. Elliott had been connected with the old company. There was a violent competition at Washington about the renewal of the lease, and the new company got it from the old, and Mr. Elliott's side was defeated, and then immediately after—that is to say, within two or three months, he made his appearance on the islands.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are asked to confer this power upon the Secretary of the Treasury—to permit him, if he fails to bring about satisfactory arrangements with Great Britain, to destroy the entire seal herd—although such eminent authorities as Prof. David Starr Jordan, Senator MORGAN, Senator Sherman, and the Secretary of the Treasury himself have reported against it, with only one witness in its favor, Mr. Elliott, whose evidence was discredited by our own representatives before the Paris tribunal.

If we are to renew negotiations with Great Britain, as I trust we shall, let us do so with clean hands. Let us not condemn Great Britain for her barbarity and then announce that we propose to perform an act that is infinitely worse. If section 5 of the bill is intended seriously, it is, to quote President Jordan, preposterous. If it is intended as a mere diplomatic maneuver, it is absurd.

Were it possible to amend this bill by striking out section 5, there could be no objection to its passage; but inasmuch as that is not possible, inasmuch as we must accept it wholly or reject it entirely, I see no way that I can do my duty without asking the House to refuse to pass the bill. [Applause.]

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEIDLER].

Mr. BEIDLER. Mr. Speaker, there are two points striven to be covered by this bill. One is the preservation of this seal herd, the other is putting a stop to the inhuman manner of killing them.

We have facts and figures presented to us that show clearly the main cause of the falling away of this herd from 4,500,000 individuals in 1872 to 200,000 now to be the fact that the females are killed in the sea and the young, their pups, so called, are allowed to die of starvation on the islands.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] takes issue with section 5 of the bill and says it would be wrong to destroy this herd. If the present methods are continued there will be nothing to stop the extinction of the herd within a short time. In 1872 there were 100,000 4 and 3 year old male skins taken. In the year 1902, thirty years thereafter, out of a catch of only eleven thousand and some hundreds, only 424 skins were those of 4 and 3 year olds, showing that practically the herd is extinct to-day.

Under section 5 of this bill 10,000 females and 1,000 males are allowed to remain on the islands. All the herd being killed but that number, it will entirely put a stop to pelagic sealing and cause the herd to increase again as in former years.

I will now introduce the following correspondence and exhibits:

LAKEWOOD, OHIO, December 3, 1901.

Hon. J. A. BEIDLER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Public abuses, public impositions, always prevail under our form of government until the attention of Congress and the Executive is centered on them. When that is fairly done, then they cease, and their abatement is usually prompt.

To that end I desire to enlist your aid in getting Congress to act at once in putting a stop, quickly, to that shameful condition of affairs on the Seal Islands of Alaska which, unchecked, will result in the extermination of the male life thereon by 1906, and in order that you may have a general idea of what that imposition on the public really is, and will continue to be to the bitter end unless you act in the premises, I respectfully submit the following:

In 1867, when Alaska passed into our possession, we received from Russia a herd of fur seals on the Pribilof or Seal Islands which I found by elaborate survey in 1872 to consist of at least 4,500,000 seals of all ages and classes.

To protect and save this herd of valuable and harmless animals, Congress in 1868 made these Seal Islands a Government reservation and put all the seal hunters that had rushed up and were about to rush up out of the field. In 1870, after much deliberation, it passed the act approved July 1, 1870, which leased the islands for a term of twenty years, restricted the annual catch of seals to 100,000 young males, and put the entire charge, responsibility, and detail upon the Secretary of the Treasury. The action of Congress was wise; it was in every way happy in its working, and no better step has ever been suggested since, until the trouble dawned (in 1887) of pelagic hunting of fur seals upon the conduct of this business.

I will not recite the painful history of the scandalous, weak, and puerile management of our case against Great Britain which culminated at Paris August 16, 1893, and which cost us the loss of our fur seals; but worse than that, in another way, it reflected severely on our reputation for possessing mental acumen and common honesty, since our agents who managed the case had given no evidence before this tribunal that they were endowed with a single one of these attributes.

The abortive regulations of the Paris tribunal were put into effect, and proven by their resultant working to be worse than useless by the end of the sealing season of 1894. Stung by the loss of life so shamefully killed under the cover of law, the late Governor Dingley, then in the House, and the late Judge Gresham, then Secretary of State, called upon me for some suggestion of an effective step which, under the existing law, treaty, etc., could be taken by our Government to put an end to this misery and waste of life on the Pribilof Islands.

The result of this careful investigation and concerted work of Governor Dingley and Judge Gresham was embodied in what was known as the Dingley seal bill. It was first introduced by Governor Dingley (H. R. 8633) January 20, 1895, and was referred to the Ways and Means Committee, from which committee it was unanimously reported (No. 1849) by Mr. W. L. Wilson, the chairman, February 18. On February 22 it was unanimously passed by the House; but the sine die adjournment of Congress on March 4, 1895, did not give the bill time for action in the Senate.

Again Governor Dingley introduced the bill (H. R. 3206; Report No. 451) January 3, 1896; again it was fully considered by the Ways and Means Committee, and again it was unanimously reported to the House February 20, 1896; and on February 25 it was again unanimously passed by the House after full debate.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee acted promptly, and it was favorably reported by Mr. FRYE March 4, and made a special order for Thursday, March 16, 2 p. m., and so placed on the Calendar.

Now, what happened to arrest and defeat this sensible, merciful bill? Richard Olney, who became Secretary of State after the death of Judge Gresham, in June, 1895, suddenly became impressed with the conceit that he could so manage the business as to abate this acknowledged imposition and nuisance without the help of that bill. He therefore wrote to Senator FRYE, saying so, in short, and asked that the bill be not taken up, for its passage "would greatly embarrass" him, if not "totally defeat the pending negotiations." Senator FRYE had no alternative. The bill was dropped.

Mr. Olney simply collapsed—he was quickly disarmed when the Canadians measured their wit against his, just as I knew he would be, and as the other friends of the Dingley seal bill predicted, when he had the want of good sense to interfere with it.

But the Canadians went further; they steered the dazed Mr. Olney into a renewal of the "joint commission" nonsense, which was so painful in its results for us at Paris; they persuaded Mr. Olney to believe that if he would send up an agent or two, "experts," to meet their "experts" on the islands—to meet them "informally;" that if these experts agreed upon any regulations as being better suited for the protection of the herd than the existing ones, why they would—well, yes, probably make the change.

Then Mr. Olney, finding that he could have a joint commission but not invested with any powers, loaded the affair upon the Treasury Department. Accordingly in June, 1896, we have the appointment of David Starr Jordan as a "commissioner in charge of fur-seal investigations," for the United States, appointed (June 18) by the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Jordan was aided by a half dozen of lesser lights whom he called his "staff," all of them, like himself, inexperienced.

The Canadians then secured the appointment of D'Arcy W. Thompson, a teacher of biology in Dundee University, Scotland, to pair off with Jordan, and one of their own scouts, Mr. James Macoun, to represent the British "staff." This "joint commission" of "experts"—Jordan with six associates and Thompson with only one—went to work to investigate into the real status of the conditions as questioned, in June, 1896.

The Canadians again went to work with the same success that distinguished their efforts when they skinned our agents at Paris in 1893. They ensalivated Jordan, flattered his conceit, and really got him to publicly declare, at the close of the first season's work, that he had "a perfect agreement with them" on "all matters of fact," and on "all questions of policy." (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Feb. 28, 1897, p. 2619; remarks of Senator PERKINS.)

After playing with Dr. Jordan and his "staff" another season (1897), and long enough to get them well entangled, the Canadians steered them into a "fur-seal conference," and rejoiced in having that notorious architect of that botch of our case at Paris, John W. Foster, again to deal with, as the "special envoy and minister extraordinary" to manage Dr. Jordan's "perfect agreement" with them.

On the 16th November, 1897, our agents surrendered every point that we had justly made against an infamous industry to the Canadian keeping and satisfaction in the form of a "joint statement of conclusions," whereby our hands are officially tied in so far as executive action in either State or Treasury Department is concerned forever! [We are, free, however, to clean up the wreck and stop the imposition by act of Congress.]

When the Canadian minister of marine and fisheries openly boasted a few days after this surrender of our case was made, he did not take the power of Congress into mind or he would not have said this:

"TORONTO, November 27, 1897.

"Sir Louis H. Davies, at a meeting of the Liberals here last evening, referred to his recent visit to Washington to attend the seal conference. He said:

"'The seal experts settled the question of fact in such a way that hereafter it can not be opened up. We know exactly where we are.'"

Yes, but we know, too, Mr. BEIDLER, what he does not know—that you and your fellow-members have the power to show him and his pelagic crew that this question can be opened up in spite of the folly of one agent or the dull wit of another.

I therefore inclose a copy of the Dingley seal bill of 1896, and ask that you modify it so that it will apply to the present day and date and introduce it at your earliest convenience. The passage of this bill at an early day in the session and before the pelagic sealing season opens in Bering Sea for 1902 will put an end to an infamous industry, save the fur-seal species from extermination, and heal a running sore.

The argument for its passage which I made February 18, 1896, before the Ways and Means Committee was printed by that committee, and I inclose a copy for your information.

In order that Congress may understand the utter uselessness and the mischief in the premises caused by the result of Jordan's work in 1896-97, I also inclose a review of its salient blunders and most inexcusable mistakes—only a few of them; to dress them all down would necessitate the cutting of every page in his report, and the time for that complete work is not at my command at present; it is not necessary, either, for what I have opened up to public view in this revision inclosed is ample, and enough to illustrate the ignoble failure of his work and his idle attempt to better that shameful order of affairs on the seal islands of Alaska, which has been so mischievous in its resultant "joint agreement" with the agents of the pelagic hunter. I also inclose that "agreement," item by item, as he signed it with his British associates, and have placed the items of "fact" which he prepared himself for that "agreement" side by side with those items of "fact," which the Canadians persuaded him to sign, and thus surrender his own. (Exhibit B et seq.)

In this amazing State paper we are placed in the absurd light of officially declaring that under existing law, regulations, and trade condition the fur-seal herd of Alaska was and is entirely secure from extermination of the species; that it had reached in 1897 as low an ebb in its form and number as it ever would, since the killing on land and in the sea had become unprofitable to both land and sea butchers, on account of the small number of seals left alive on the islands; that an equilibrium had been attained.

The exact reverse of this "joint conclusion" is the truth; the fur-seal herd is in danger of immediate extermination, and the proceeds of the pelagic hunter's work have netted him an enormous profit in 1900 and again in 1901—over 100 per cent profit.

This astounding ignorance of the true condition of affairs on the seal islands of Alaska is repeated by the perfunctory report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Lyman J. Gage, to Congress, last December, wherein not a single hint of the swift impending extermination of this life in his charge is given to the public; it is charitable to believe in his ignorance, and so let him pass into that mass of official wreckage which the mismanagement of this business since 1890 has heaped up in Washington.

The entire record of this conduct since 1890, on our part, of the Alaskan fur-seal business, save that brief interval of Governor Dingley's and Judge Gresham's work in 1895-96, has been one uninterrupted narrative of shameful, humiliating failure. In order that an end be made to any possibility of another exhibition of stilted tomfoolery at the expense of the American public over the pretense of saving our fur-seal herd from that indecent and ruinous extermination of the species, now right at hand. I earnestly urge you to act. Put in that Dingley seal bill of 1896, and push it to its final passage. It is a merciful measure, and unless it is enacted the complete destruction of the fur-seal species of Alaska will take place in 1906-7.

Very sincerely, yours,

HENRY W. ELLIOTT.

EXHIBIT A.

Analysis and review of the report of Dr. D. S. Jordan, submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury February 24, 1898, as "Commissioner in charge of fur seal investigations," 1896-97.

[Only the salient and chief errors are noticed in this connection; the lesser and unimportant items are passed without mention.]

THE INITIAL BLUNDER.

The final report of Dr. Jordan on the fur seals of the Pribilof Islands has been recently issued. The preliminary reports of this gentleman in 1896 and 1897 have been variously commented on in the press as they appeared, and the public generally were lead to believe that some practical good was to accrue from the investigation which he was conducting; but our people now know that Dr. Jordan's "perfect agreement" with the British agents was a simple delusion which he so joyfully announced to the United States Senate, through Senator PERKINS, in these words: "England shows every indication of a desire to do the fair thing. This intention is especially clear in the fact that she has sent an honorable commission which is familiar with all the facts ascertained by us, the head of the commission having been with me every day throughout the summer, and he and I being in agreement on all questions of policy, as well as on all matters of fact, so far as was developed by our conversations during the expedition." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 28, 1897, p. 2619.)

How badly Dr. Jordan failed to understand his British colleague was made plain by that gentleman's report to his Government, issued May 10, 1897, in which Dr. Jordan was taught the sober lesson that Professor Thompson did not subscribe to him in any question of policy respecting the management of the fur-seal herd, and to no essential details of fact. (Report of Prof. D'Arcy Thompson on his mission to Bering Sea in 1896, dated March 4, 1897; U. S., November 3, 1897.)

Now that Dr. Jordan has given public evidence of his utter inability to understand what his own field associate on the seal grounds in 1896 intended to say or do, I believe I have a good right to show that Dr. Jordan has made an equally grave blunder in regard to what I did on the seal islands in 1872-1874, and is equally incompetent to understand what I have said. In the final report of his investigation, above mentioned, he devotes a large space to the subject of my work on the census of the fur-seal herds in 1872-1874, and in this space endeavors to show that I was "merely guessing," and making "Mr. Elliott wholly devoid of mathematical sense, or else must have failed to appreciate what his figures really meant."

In Dr. Jordan's preliminary report of 1896 (Treasury Dept. Doc. No. 1913) he alludes to this census work of mine in no such language, and mildly doubts the probability of my figures being right; he does not in this report give me the warrant to handle him without gloves which appears in this his final report, and to handle him at once on this question is both my pleasure and a public duty.

Let me describe my early mission and its auspices. I first set out in April, 1872, for the seal islands to gather information and collect for the Smithsonian Institution. When I arrived on the islands, April 22, 1872, I landed there without the slightest pressure from anyone or instructions to work out a case for lawyers and diplomats to tinker over and botch. I was to get the data as to the life history of the fur seal by observing that life on the ground, and to make as full a collection of the skins, skeletons, etc., as the circumstances of my living on the islands would permit.

I was received in the most cordial manner on the islands by both Government and lessee agents; every facility given me to work, and everything that I questioned or inquired into was answered and opened in perfect good faith and to best of the ability of those men. I quickly made myself acquainted with enough of the Russian language so that I could freely get the personal ideas and facts possessed by the Aleuts or natives bearing on the seals, thus checking my inquiries from one person to another. I never was misinformed by design, and by so doing never permitted myself to be deceived on that score. I devoted three consecutive seasons—1872, 1873, 1874—to close biological study of the fur-seal life, spending the winter of 1872-73 on the islands so that I could see with my own eyes the entire routine of arrival and departure of the seals from their haunts on the islands. The result of these studies was first briefly epitomized and published by the Treasury Department in 1874, and finally when I found that I could not so arrange my private affairs as to permit of a two years' absence from home in order to study the Russian herd, I gave my elaborated work of 1872-1874 to the late Gen. Francis A. Walker, at his solicitation, with the sanction of the Smithsonian Institution, for publication as one of the initial monographs of the Tenth Census, United States of America.

In this monograph it became imperative to omit much detail in the line of my record of daily observations on the rookeries, because if it were all incorporated the volume would be too bulky, compared with the other monographs ahead, for the funds of the Census Office to print; therefore my original colored rookery maps and hundreds of notes and illustrations carefully drawn from life were excluded, very reluctantly, by the authorities, and only then because they believed I had covered the ground fully, even in their abridged form. When I suggested to Professor Baird that all of the details of my chapter on the census of the seals, pictures, maps, and all, should be incorporated, he replied, saying that I had made it clear enough and easily understood in the abridged version.

Repeatedly since the publication of that monograph in 1882 has this question of the population of the fur-seal rookeries on the Pribilof Islands been raised in my presence by naturalists of far greater ability than Dr. Jordan, and I have never failed to satisfy them of the substantial soundness of my views and figures. Now that Dr. Jordan at this late hour attempts to impeach their integrity, I propose to impale his sophisms, assumptions, and misstatements on a few pointed facts.

Dr. Jordan says (on page 77): "The next attempt at enumeration was made in 1872-1874 by Henry W. Elliott, special agent sent by the United States Treasury Department to investigate the condition of the herd. He followed the same general method inaugurated by Captain Bryant, finding the shore extent and width of the rookeries and allotting a certain space to each individual animal. He, however, worked out the plans in much greater detail." This is a deliberate misstatement of fact. Captain Bryant made an estimate in 1870 of the area and extent of the breeding grounds of the Pribilof Islands, when at the time he had never laid his eyes on a single rookery on St. George Island, and had seen but three of the seven breeding grounds on St. Paul, and these he saw through a telescope from the deck of a steamer. He then made the assertion that "there are at least 12 miles of shore line on the island of St. Paul occupied by the seals as breeding grounds, with the average width of 15 rods. There being about 20 seals to the square rod, gives 1,152,000 as the whole number of breeding males and females. Deducting one-tenth for males leaves 1,037,800 breeding females." He then proceeded to estimate the St. George seals at "about one-half the number of St. Paul."

By the very nature of things this estimate was a mere guess. The author of it never saw one-hundredth part of the area he figured on, and he did not know enough of the animals, and for that matter never knew enough, to understand that placing 20 of them on a square rod of superficial area was a ludicrous expansion of their real method of hauling on the breeding grounds. It was the frank and good-natured personal admission of the old man Bryant to me, when I went up with him on the same steamer to the islands in April, 1872, that he did not know anything definite about the subject; that he was merely guessing, as any old whaler might calculate "dead reckoning" in a fog, that caused me to set so promptly to work when I arrived on a preliminary topographical survey of the area and position of each breeding ground on the islands, as well as making surveys of the entire shore lines of both. But I had no idea as I began the work and completed it, in so far as the landed area went, of making a census of the seals upon the line of Captain Bryant's speculation, because I early saw that there were so many variations in the sizes of the seals, the irregular massing and unmassing of the harems, that the plan of locating just so many adult seals to a given area was impracticable.

But as I hung over these rookeries day after day I became impressed with the fact that no matter whether the mother seals were present on the ground, or absent on their food excursions, their pups, or young ones, never left the immediate area of their birthplace on the rookery up to a time in the season not later than the 10th or 20th of each July; that if I counted them in a given area during that period I should then know just how many cows belonged to it, and only by taking the pups as my guide could I get at the real number of females; the males were steadfastly on the ground all the time, and then a general estimate for the number of virgin females could be made on the ratio of this pup count, as it was the basis of the birth rate of the entire herd.

While this subject grew upon me, I called the attention of my associates on the island (St. Paul, 1872-73) to it. One of these gentlemen, Mr. William Kapus, was an unusually well-educated man (the company's general manager) and a man of affairs as well. He took a deep interest in the solution of this seal-space problem, as I presented it to him in the following form, also Dr. Kramer, the surgeon, another cultivated, scholary man, aided me in the inquiry:

1. The seals haul out on these breeding grounds with great evenness of massing—never crowded unduly here or scattered there—so evenly that if suddenly every mother were to appear at the height of the season there would be just room enough for all, without suffocating or inconveniencing their lives on the rocks.

2. That in estimating the number of seals in the breeding grounds we must make the number of pups present at the height of the season the unit of calculation, because their mothers are never all present at any one time, not half, and at many times not one-third of them are; that the height of the breeding season is between July 10 and 20 annually.

Upon these two fundamental propositions I stirred up a vigorous discussion and examination as to their truth or untruth among the white men then on the islands, or St. Paul Island especially, late in 1872, and until the close of the season of 1873 the settlement of this question was left open. Then each and every white man on the islands at that time (there were nine of them) subscribed heartily to the truth of these, my assumptions, as a true working hypothesis.

Now, what does Jordan say about this particular law of even distribution on the rookeries which I formulated in 1872? Before I quote him I want to say that Jordan when he landed on the Pribilof Islands for the first time in his life, July 8, 1896, saw nothing but a ghostly remnant of the life I was observing and studying in 1872-74. The few seals that have in declining generations survived and were wandering about over the edges of those immense areas of deserted hauling grounds of 1872 and had ranged themselves in widely scattered and irregularly massed harems on fringes of the abandoned rookery slopes of 1872 became to his inexperienced eye "a great many thousands" and "a strong nucleus." Never having seen what I saw, he became deeply impressed with the form of what only aroused my pity in 1890, as it had stimulated my wonder and admiration in 1872-1874. With this wretched understanding and loaded to the gunwale with it, Jordan says in regard to my basic propositions as above cited:

"One who is familiar with the nature of the breeding grounds can not help feeling that in the foundation of this law Mr. Elliott did not have the picture of the rookeries before him. Had he traveled over the length and breath of the rookeries, as was done in 1896 and 1897, he never would have proposed such a law; that there should be as many seals to the square rod on the jagged and broken lava rocks of Kitovi or on the broken slopes of Gorbatch, where the animals are now, and must have then been, separated by bowlders weighing tons, should be the same as on the smooth sand flat of Tolstoi or the level slope of Hutchinson hill, is on the face of it impossible."

Just because I had traveled over these rookeries day in and day out, when seals were there and when absent, was why I recognized this law of distribution, and I will safely venture to say that I have taken two steps to Jordan's one in this work on the rookery grounds. With every fissure and embedded lava rock (these loose "bowlders weighing tons" on Kitovi, and only few such "bowlders" on Gorbatch) I am familiar, and I found to my surprise at first that Kitovi was an ideal massing ground for the breeding seals, and Gorbatch also; that these jagged rocks, nearly all deeply embedded in the detritus of the cinder and lava slopes, actually carried more seals than if they were perfect plane surfaces. Wherever I found a miniature lava butte on these breeding grounds (they are all of volcanic superstructure) that the seals could not scale or otherwise occupy, the area of the same was deducted from the sum of square feet belonging to the ground, and I never made the "blunder of assuming the same distribution everywhere," by taking this precaution and in the following way:

First, I carefully located the herds as they lay on the several breeding grounds during the height of the season, i. e., between July 10 and 20, which I discovered to be the time in 1872. This location was rapidly and accurately made on a land chart of the rookery ground prepared early in the season and before the seals had hauled out. By having these charts all ready, with the stations from which my base lines and angles were taken, all plainly in my view when the seals hauled out, it was a simple thing to place the bearings of the massed herds on the chart. The Reef and Gorbatch grounds made a busy day's work, and no more for me because thus prepared; the same of Zapadnie; Tolstoi easily finished in half a day; same of Lukannon; same of Kitovi; Polavina a short day's work, while Novastoshals, or the large Northeast point breeding ground, took the best part of two days. The St. George rookeries were handled in even shorter time by this method.

Not content with assuming that I had not traveled over the rookeries as he had, Jordan proceeds to ignore the written record of my work in regard to counting the pups. On page 79 of his report he makes the gratuitous assertion that I did not know that all the breeding seals were not present on the rookeries at any one time during the height of the season. Mark his language, which my published work in 1880 disproves every word of: "But of these things Mr. Elliott was not aware. He was content to assume that all the cows were there."

What do I say about these cows, published sixteen years before Jordan ever saw a cow seal, and then for the first time on the Pribilof rookeries? "The females appear to go to and come from the water to feed and bathe quite frequently after bearing their young, and usually return to the spot, or its immediate neighborhood, where they leave their pups." * * *

Again I say: "A mother comes up from the sea, whither she has been to wash and perhaps to feed for the last day or two." * * * (Page 39, Monograph, Seal Islands of Alaska. Washington, 1880.) And still worse for Dr. Jordan, on pages 104 and 105 of the same monograph, Fish Commission edition, 1882, appears the still more explicit proof of his deliberate inability to give credit to truth. What better impalement of Jordan can be devised than these words of mine: "The umbilicus of the pup rapidly sloughs off, and the little fellow grows apace, nursing to-day heartily, in order that he may perhaps go the next two, three, or four days without another drop from the maternal fount; for it is the habit of the mother seal to regularly and frequently leave her young on this, the spot of its birth, to repair for food in the sea. She is absent by these excursions, on account of the fish not coming inshore within a radius of (at the least) 100 miles of the breeding grounds, though intervals varying, as I have said, from a single day to three or four, as the case may be."

And with this published record of my thorough understanding of the truth that the cows are not present all the time, as early as 1872-1874, in his hands, Dr. Jordan deliberately attempts to rob me of that credit which naturalists all over this world have given to me, and still give for my accurate work on these islands. I say he "attempts," and I say it advisedly, for that is all it amounts to.

From this unjustifiable misrepresentation Dr. Jordan proceeds to make an analysis of my figures of the population of the seal rookeries, as published in 1872-1874 and enlarged upon by me again in 1880. Now he steps upon ground of legitimate criticism, and I am more than ready to meet it. With reference to my figures (Monograph, Seal Islands, p. 61), he says: "Waiving for a moment the method of obtaining these figures, we may remark that they are not easy to understand. Of this total 'of breeding seals and young,' Mr. Elliott, in the same connection, tells us that 1,000,000 'are young.' There must, then, be an equal number of mothers, or 2,000,000 adult breeding females and their pups. To this must be added the young 2-year-old cows that are included, though not present. Mr. Elliott has himself given us an estimate of these. Considering, of the 1,000,000 pups born 500,000 are females, he says 'that at least 225,000 of them safely return in the second season after birth.' This, therefore, gives us a total of 2,225,000 females and young in the complete estimate of 3,193,420, leaving 868,428 animals which can only be accounted for as breeding bulls. This is impossible, and yet no other explanation of the discrepancy is at hand."

This is exactly quoted as it stands in Dr. Jordan's final report, page 79; and if it were not for the deliberate misstatement that "Mr. Elliott in the same connection tells us that 1,000,000 'are young,'" there might indeed be "no other explanation of the discrepancy" at hand. But "in the same connection" I do not say anything of the kind about only 1,000,000 pups being born out of this grand total on the Pribilof Islands; on the contrary, on page 61 (Monograph, Seal Islands), I present a carefully tabulated statement of the exact ratio of seal life on the several breeding grounds of the Pribilof Islands, summing it up by the square feet of sea margin, multiplied by the average depth as "grand sum total for the Pribilof Islands (season of 1873), breeding seals and young, 3,193,420," saying as I do so that these figures as above show this total. Then I proceed to open another and distinctly separate enumeration of the nonbreeding, or bachelor, seals, which I clearly declare entirely outside of any basic calculation, having no initial point like the breeding seals; and I close this summary of the seal life on the seal islands on the following page.

Then I take up under an entirely different caption an entirely different question. I take up then the question of "The increase or diminution of the seal life, past, present, and prospective." I enter upon a purely speculative theme and do not attempt to speak except in broad, general terms. Taking up that subject in this connection and not in conjunction with the statement of facts preceding it, I enter upon a hypothetical expression of what I believe the loss of life sustained by the young seals amounts to. I use the broad general assertion that "1,000,000 pups or young seals, in round numbers, are annually born upon these islands of the Pribilof group every year." Naturally to point my speculation in figures of loss, which follows, it is better and easier to say "1,000,000" than 1,296,710, which would be the exact line of figures if the speculation was treated as a matter based upon fact.

But I merely assume that half of the pups get back as yearlings next year, and that assumption is as well or better illustrated by a general figure than a specific one. The result is precisely the same anyway, and really has in either case of exact or general figures the same value. In my own mind at the time I was inclined to think that fully one-half of these pups did not get back, and so I preferred the general or indefinite figure rather than to strain an exact division of the pups into a vague theory. Jordan himself is guilty of this fusion of fact and theory repeatedly in his report. But I never have permitted it in my work.

Then Jordan proceeds to make himself still more erroneous in assumption. He says: "But if these figures were in themselves reasonable we must still take exception to the method by which they were obtained. * * * On his method of surveying the rookeries Mr. Elliott has given us practically no data."

The stupidity or else the effrontery of this statement as to my giving him no data can be well understood by reference to the elaborate charts of these breeding grounds which are published in my report of 1890. (H. R. Doc. 175, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.) These surveys were so elaborate and so full of detail that General Walker, in 1890, was unable to publish them in the Census Monograph owing to lack of funds for their preparation, and I reluctantly inserted a small series of indeterminate pen and ink sketch maps to illustrate the general idea; but in 1890 I took them up to the islands with me and placed my work of that season on them in turn, making in this way the very best contrast of the condition of 1872–1874 with that of 1890 that could have been devised.

Unlike Dr. Jordan, I am not a barber's apprentice in topographical work. I served three summers under the best of topographers in the field, 1869–1871, inclusive, doing exactly such work as this on the seal islands—i. e., making original surveys of unmapped districts in the Rocky Mountain region. Until I made my surveys of the seal islands in 1872–1874 there was nothing on the maps that faintly resembled the area, the contour, or the topography of the Pribilof group. The Russian charts of them were perfect caricatures and the American copies no better.

So good were my charts of St. Pauls Island that a surveying party of the United States Coast Survey, when it landed there in July, 1874, asked for and received from me copies of it, which they did not alter in the slightest noteworthy degree after spending a week on the ground, and it was shortly after published by the Coast Survey Office, with scant credit to me, its author. However, I care nothing for that, and I only mention it because Dr. Jordan calls in one of his subordinates to appear as a swift witness against me as a surveyor. Jordan says: "Of these maps Captain Moser, in his hydrographic report on the islands, made certain tests. Of Mr. Elliott's shore line he says: 'It was a bad misfit, and rarely stood the test of an instrumental angle.' He further says of the topography of the maps that 'it is so vague and indefinite that it is next to impossible to do anything with them. I should call them sketches.'"

It will do Jordan good and take the conceit out of this Captain Moser to know that these charts of mine stood the test of instrumental angles to the entire satisfaction of Capt. J. G. Baker, United States Revenue Marine, and Lieut. (now Captain) Washburn Maynard, United States Navy in 1874, and Captain Colson, United States Revenue Marine, in 1890. Each and every one of those trained hydrographers expressed their approval of these charts and their surprise at the accuracy with which I had plotted the shore lines. Captain Maynard in 1874 went all over the rookeries with my detailed charts of the same, made in 1872–73, and between us there we verified and corrected every one of them, so that these records which I made in those years can not be whistled down the wind by an inexperienced or jealous man or men.

Following this attempt to destroy the sense of my chart work (on p. 80), Jordan raises a question and then answers it, as usual, wrong. He says: "To each one of the seven of the ten rookeries of St. Paul Island Mr. Elliott ascribes an average width of 150 feet. Two of the remaining breeding grounds have an average width of 100 feet each, and the third 40 feet. * * * Whatever the average width of each rookery may have been, it was certain it was not the same for all. Neither now nor at the past times Tolstoi, Polovina, Vostochin, the Reef, Kitovi, Lukannin, and Zapadin had the same average width. The 150 feet is a guess, and that only."

A guess, and that only! Indeed! The utter ignorance of the method of my work which Dr. Jordan assumes, or really is afflicted with, can be well understood when I take up for instance the case of Tolstoi, to show how easy it is for certain people, like Jordan, who, having ears, hear not, and eyes, see not. On page 38 of my 1890 report, which was in Jordan's hands when he first started for the seal islands, appears the following detailed explanation of each and every step taken by me in surveying each and every rookery, as well as Tolstoi.

Detailed analysis of the survey of Tolstoi rookery July 10, 1890.

[Sea margin beginning at A and ending at D.]

	Square feet.
800 feet sea margin between A and B, with 80 feet average depth, massed	64,000
400 feet sea margin between B and C, with 60 feet average depth, massed	25,000
1,600 feet sea margin between C and D, with 10 feet average depth, massed	16,000
Jag E has 300 feet of depth, with 40 feet average width, massed	12,000
Jag F has 100 feet of depth, with 40 feet average width, massed	4,000
Jag G has 120 feet of depth, with 40 feet average width, massed	4,800
Total square feet	124,800

The annexed colored chart that this legend illustrates carries all these stations and base-line points in detail. Every topographical feature is faithfully indicated on it, and these specialized lines of average depth were drawn over these sections of the herd as it lay upon the ground on that day and date—the proper time of the season.

Now, in order that this detailed analysis of Tolstoi can be summed up in one compact sensible expression, I take the entire length of its sea margin—2,800 feet—and divide the entire sum of its square feet of massed area—124,800 feet—by it. That enables me to say: "July 11, 1890, Tolstoi has 2,800 feet of sea margin, with 44½ feet of average depth, 124,800 square feet of superficial area, making ground for 62,400 breeding seals and young."

Here is the result in detail of my survey of Tolstoi in 1872, which was verified by myself and Capt. Washburn Maynard, United States Navy, in 1874:

Detailed analysis of the survey of Tolstoi rookery, July 15, 1872.

[Sea margin beginning at A and ending at D.]

	Square feet.
1,000 feet sea margin between A and B, with 350 feet average depth, massed	350,000
400 feet sea margin between B and C, with 150 feet average depth, massed	60,000
1,600 feet sea margin between C and D, with 30 feet average depth, massed	48,000

Three thousand feet sea margin on Tolstoi breeding ground and 458,000 square feet in it, making ground, in round numbers, for 225,000 seals.

It will be noted that in this Tolstoi summary for 1872 I ignore the real presence of 8,000 square feet and deliberately reduce that estimate of seals from 229,500 to 225,000, because I never ran the risk in my work of 1872 and 1890 of being a foot or two ahead of the real average. I carried this cautious reservation all through my surveys of each and every rookery, and this is the reason why Captain Maynard, my associate in the work of 1874, makes his estimate, based upon this survey, of the sum total of Pribilof seal life so much higher than mine. He declared that he was satisfied, from close personal supervision of taking all our land angles in 1874, that I was safely inside of the real limit of supervision, and that the figures of the survey were conservative and right. He was then, as he is now, a skilled mathematician and hydrographer, and he had the right to his opinion based upon the figures of that careful work. Yet Jordan has the sublime ignorance in 1898 to sneer at this unbiased, careful survey of 1872–1874 by saying "the 150 feet is a guess, and that only" (p. 80, note).

I used these figures of 1890 in detail for Tolstoi because I do not give the detailed analysis or figures of 1872–1874 (only the summary) in my 1890 report of its sea margin and square feet, viz, "3,000 feet of sea margin, making ground for 225,000 breeding seals and their young," not deeming it necessary to produce so many detailed figures, when my charts for both seasons were in full evidence in the published work of 1890.

As with Tolstoi, so with every other rookery on the Pribilof Islands. But Jordan, holding all this incontestible proof of careful survey in his hands, can not "verify Mr. Elliott's surveys of the rookeries!"

Jordan, also, in this connection has been careful not to quote the reason why I made these elaborate charts in 1872–1874. If he did, he would render his method of counting the seals, or, rather, guessing at the exact count of individual bulls, cows, and pups, idle and abortive. I said in 1874, speaking of my law of uniform distribution of breeding seals on the rookeries:

"This fact being determined, it is evident that just in proportion as the breeding grounds of the fur seal on these islands expand or contract in area from their present dimensions, the seals will increase or diminish in number." How well my charts of 1890 laid upon those of 1872–1874 tell that story! How futile the rambling and self-contradicting seal-counting work of Jordan to express the truth! Listen to Jordan himself, on page 101. He unwittingly trips himself there on this very point: "The only reliable basis of enumeration has been found and determined. This is a count of live pups." (This is what I published in 1872–1874.) Then on page 341, part 2, Jordan hamstrings himself in the following language:

"It is evidently impossible to make an accurate census of the seals on St. Paul Island, because on the great rookeries, as the Reef Gorbatch, Tolstoi, and Zapadin no one can either estimate or count the cows (sic). Nor can one do it at Polovina, because there is no one point of view where the whole rookery is visible. Even the bulls can be only roughly estimated." Very true, Dr. Jordan, but why does Dr. Jordan on page 83, part 1, call in this remarkable witness to his own inability to reason on his own lines of argument? "In the same year (1879) Mr. Beaman records under date of June 10 that 'there were a couple of thousand bulls' on Polovina rookeries, when Mr. Elliott estimates fully 10,000 in 1874."

I never made the blunder of attempting to count all the bulls, all the cows, or all the pups on any rookery in 1872–1874. The utter stupidity of such a step never entered my head. It never did in 1890, even, when the ragged remnant of the great life of 1872 was before me. It has only remained for Jordan and his job lot of assistants to race up and down these desolated breeding areas in their idle attempts to do so; and the record of the self-contradiction of their own work bristles with the folly of it on a score of pages in his report.

Having made this exhibition of careless incapacity to grasp details of evidence easily at hand with which to guide him to an authentic statement of what the form and numbers of our fur seal herd were in 1872–1874—a point of departure of vital importance to the success of any argument in showing the decline of this herd, and the absence of which in his (Jordan's) report has been repeatedly alluded to by Lord Salisbury as sufficient warrant for Her Majesty's Government in refusing to accept our complaint or assertion that a dangerous decline of the herd had taken place—having done so, Jordan then proceeds to make the matter still worse for himself and our cause, which, unfortunately for us and the seals, he was in charge of at the time.

On page 80, Dr. Jordan says: "But aside from the question of accuracy in the surveys themselves, Mr. Elliott has assigned an impossible space to each individual seal. His unit of space is two square feet to each animal, young or old, or four square feet for the cows, ignoring the pups. * * * In a standing position she (the cow) would need at least three square feet, but as the cows are constantly moving about, and coming and going to and from the sea it is impossible to limit one to such a space."

At this point, and in this connection, Jordan may be pardoned for his inability to understand the massing of the breeding seals in 1872–1874, when there were seven to ten times as many of them as contrasted with their number when he first saw them in 1896.

In 1890, when I landed on the seal islands after a continuous absence from them for sixteen years, the sight of their abandoned and shrunken seal grounds impressed me instantly. Not so were the newcomers, the Treasury agents who traveled up with me. They, like Jordan, only saw "thousands of seals—many thousands," and it was really hard to get them to appreciate the gravity of the condition of the herd. I told them on the 1st of June, 1890, that they would not get the quota of 60,000, and not a man, agent of company or Treasury, or a native for that matter, then agreed with me on the islands. But by the end of the month they saw the truth as I had declared it.

Here is what I published in 1872–1874 relative to the seal unit of space, and it is clear enough to men who have reasoned to the line with me on the ground itself—to men like Captain Maynard, United States Navy, 1874, and William Kapus, general manager of the lessees in 1872–73, and all of their official associates who were with them at that time:

"Rookery space occupied by single seals.—When the adult males and females, 15 or 20 of the latter to every 1 of the former, have arrived upon the rookery, I think an area little less than 2 square feet for each female may be considered as the superficial space required by each animal with regard to its size and in obedience to its habits, and this limit may safely be said to be over the mark. Now, every female or cow on this 2 feet square of space doubles herself by bringing forth her young, and in a few days or a week, perhaps, after its birth the cow takes to the water to wash and feed, and is not back on this allotted space one-half of the time again during the season. In this way is it not clear that the females almost double their number on the rookery grounds without causing the expansion of the same beyond the limits that would be actually required did they not bear any young at all? For every 100,000 breeding seals there will be found more than 85,000 females and less than 15,000 males, and in a few weeks after the landing of these females they will show for themselves—that is, for this 100,000—fully 180,000 males, females, and young instead, on the same area of ground occupied previously to the birth of the pups.

"It must be borne in mind that perhaps 10 or 12 per cent of the entire number of females were yearlings last season and come up on to these breeding grounds as nubiles for the first time during this season—as 2-year-old cows; they, of course, bear no young. The males, being treble and quadruple the physical bulk of the females, require about 4 feet square for their use of this same rookery ground; but, as they are less than one-fifteenth the number of the females, much less in fact, they therefore occupy only one-eighth of the space over the breeding ground, where we have located the supposed 100,000. This surplus area of the males is also more than balanced and equalized by the 15,000 or 20,000 2-year-old females which come on to this ground for the first time to meet the males. They come, rest a few days or a week, and retire, leaving no young to show their presence on the ground.

"The breeding bulls average 10 feet apart by 7 feet on the rookery ground; have each a space, therefore, of about 70 square feet for an average family of 15 cows, 15 pups, and 5 virgin females, or 35 animals for the 70 feet—2 square feet for each seal, big or little. The virgin females do not lay out long and the cows come and go at intervals, never all being on this ground at one time; so the bull has plenty of room in his space of 70 square feet for himself and harem.

"Taking all these points into consideration, and they are features of fact, I quite safely calculate upon an average of 2 square feet to every animal, big or little, on the breeding grounds at the initial point upon which to base an intelligent computation of the entire number of seals before us. Without following this system of enumeration, a person may look over these swarming myriads between Southwest Point and Novastoshnah, guessing vaguely and wildly at any figure from 1,000,000 up to 10,000,000 or 12,000,000, as has been done repeatedly. How few people know what a million really is! It is very easy to talk of a million, but it is a tedious task to count it off, and makes one's statements as to millions' decidedly more conservative after the labor has been accomplished."

"Transcript from the author's field notes of 1874.

"NAH SPEELKIE, St. Paul Island, July 12.

"I am satisfied to-day that the pups are the sure guide to the whole number of seals on the rookeries. The mother seals are constantly coming and going, while the pups never leave the spot upon which they are dropped more than a few feet in any direction until the rutting season ends; then they are allowed, with their mothers, by the old bulls to scatter over all the ground they want to. At this date the compact system of organization and massing on the breeding grounds is solidly maintained by the bulls; it is not relaxed in the least until on and after July 20."

Now with this life study before him, proportioned to the exact attitudes, sizes, and disposition of a harem of fur seals, what does Jordan say? Hear him: "It is true that Mr. Elliott justifies in part his small unit of space by certain references to the coming and going of the animals. He asserts that after the pups are born the 'individual cows are' not on their allotted space one-fourth of the time, and that the females 'almost double their number on the rookery ground without expanding its original limits.' But Mr. Elliott failed to grasp what this really meant. He sees in it only justification for the unit of space, which he has assigned to the individual animals. It should have called his attention to the fact that the breeding seals which he saw before him and which he was attempting to enumerate were but a part and not the whole of the rookery population."

It seems utterly incredible that any man with the least regard for the express command of written directions like those which I have published as above quoted could make such a ridiculous and senseless reduction of them. Dr. Jordan has, however, done so, and here we have the evidence of his weakness in cold type.

THE CLIMAX TO THE INITIAL BLUNDER.

Inclosing this particular review of the initial error of Dr. Jordan, who is building upon its assumption the whole structure of his computation of the numbers of the fur seal herd in 1872-1874, I will bring out into the light one of the most striking and curious blunders of the very many which he has made in this report. He has a peculiarity of asserting one thing as a fact, and then soon after, in the same sequence, he unwittingly brings in the proof of his having been mistaken as to this assumption of that fact. Perhaps the most unfortunate one of these cruel stultifications of his own making appears in the report, as follows:

On page 83 of part 1, he says:

"Mr. Elliott ascribes to Spilki rookery a population of 8,000 cows and pups in 1874, and something like 200 bulls. It is recorded by Agent Beaman in the log for the year 1879 that this rookery on June 20 (a date at which all of the harem bulls must have been in place) had 23 bulls. This is less than one-tenth of Mr. Elliott's estimate.

"In the same year Mr. Beaman records, under date of June 10, that there 'were a couple of thousand bulls' on Polavina rookery, where Mr. Elliott estimates fully 10,000 in 1874.

"While these entries do not give us definite proof as to the early condition of these rookeries, yet they clearly and conclusively show that Mr. Elliott's figures are grossly exaggerated."

If Mr. Beaman can be quoted here as an authority to show the "gross exaggeration" of my work in 1872-1874, how will it seem if I can quote Mr. Beaman from the pages of this same document, of Jordan's own composition, showing that Jordan himself is guilty of "gross exaggeration?" Observe the following on page 274, part 2, under the head of "1880:"

"May 21.—Eighty-six bulls holding positions were counted on Gorbatch. The number on the other side (i. e., the reef side) could not be counted. There were probably 300 in all, including both sides."

"May 24.—An inspection was made on Kitovi and Lukannon rookeries; 112 bulls counted on Kitovi and 142 on Lukannon, with a possible error in the count of 25 to 30."

Dr. Jordan, in placing these quotations in his report, as cited above, puts a footnote under them saying that these notes of Mr. Beaman are the work of a real "wide-awake agent" of the Government, and it is a great pity that there is no more work like it on the log, etc., and that Beaman himself did not continue these counts, since they would soon throw the needed light upon the condition of the herd in those days.

Now, mark the wretched sequel of this quotation by Dr. Jordan from Mr. Beaman for Dr. Jordan, as it follows in this final report of February 24, 1898.

On page 213 (Part I), under the heading of "Comparative census, 1896-97," Jordan publishes the result of the counts which he has made of the bulls, cows, and pups as they existed on the several rookeries during the seasons named. We read that in Gorbatch rookery in 1897 Jordan finds 308 bulls. In 1880, before the least sign of loss of life was evident on any one or all of the Pribilof rookeries, Mr. Beaman says that there were only 86 bulls!

Now, measured by this "authority," by the same Mr. Beaman, who is quoted so emphatically as such on page 83 (Part I), Jordan himself is guilty of "gross exaggeration" in showing by this table a vast increase of seal life on Gorbatch after saying in the body of his report it has been "steadily and rapidly shrinking ever since 1886-87." If Beaman is a fit "authority" to crush my work with [on p. 83, Pt. I], then he is equally fit to crush Jordan, and he certainly does it up brown [on p. 274, Pt. II].

Still worse and more of it, Jordan, in 1897, says (pp. 2, 3, Pt. I) that he counts 139 bulls on Lukannon. Beaman is quoted by Jordan [p. 247, Pt. II] as saying that in 1880 there were only 142 bulls on Lukannon "with a possible error in the count of 25 to 50;" so that in all of these seventeen years, between Beaman and Jordan, there has been no change for better or worse on that rookery.

And, again, Jordan counts 179 bulls on Kitovi rookery in 1897 (p. 213, pt. 1); but Beaman says that in 1880 there were only 112 bulls on Kitovi (p. 274, pt. 2). Thus Jordan finds another great increase of seal life since 1880 on the most desolate of all the desolated and ruined rookeries on the seal islands to-day.

Perhaps this association with Mr. Beaman will yet dawn upon the mind of Jordan as not so good a warrant for charging me with "gross exaggeration" as he thought it was. (He may not see the point, however, sharp as it is.)

This indigestible mess which Dr. Jordan has made of the above-cited question shows very clearly the fact that in this investigation which he was attempting to make he was either very careless or utterly incompetent to handle the evidence. (I am myself of the opinion that he was both. I believe that this idea will grow on other people, too, as they study that grotesque work.)

A fuller and better understanding of this woeful blunder of Dr. Jordan in re Beaman (who as a Treasury agent on St. Paul Island, in 1879-80, made a few desultory notes daily in the "log" of his office at that time) will be enhanced by the following ludicrous contrast, made by his placing his figures against those of Dr. Jordan, who seriously quotes him so authoritatively (p. 83, pt. 1, and p. 274, pt. 2):

Rookeries and number of bulls on same.

a About.

If Jordan had possessed the caution of a true investigator he would have seen in 1897, when this "log" was before him, what I saw in 1890, when it was under my eye, that these "counts" of Mr. Beaman could not be quoted intelligently or used in any form whatever, except to cloud and confuse a correct idea of the subject. Of course I have no knowledge of what Mr. Beaman was really trying to do, since it was utterly impossible to count those bulls in 1880 on any of those rookeries, unless Neh Speel, for there were then ten times as many seals upon those breeding grounds as there are to-day, and Jordan himself says there were "five times as many." Therefore, if you multiply the Jordan figures by 5, and then contrast them with Beaman's record, you will grasp the wonderful depth and darkness of that hole which Jordan has tumbled into, having dug it himself. For Mr. Beaman is not to blame—not at all.

THE OVERDRIVING BLUNDER.

The next blunder of Dr. Jordan, and one which completely discomfited him when he was brought face to face with the following facts by the British agents during his conference with them, and which he abjectly surrendered to them November 16, 1897, in his "joint agreement" of that date with them—this blunder is his insistence on the idea that no driving or culling of the young male seals or excessive killing of them ever has or ever will injure the herd. I will throw light on the subject, and at the outset say that this attempt on the part of our agents to conceal a burning truth, while conducting our case in Paris in 1893, and since by Jordan and his associates, was the chief single botch and failure of the many that they then perpetrated. Let us assume that all pelagic sealing can be and is suppressed. If so, would Dr. Jordan's view as to unrestrained killing of the very finest of the young males, if put into practice, restore the herd?

No; it will not. It will not, because certain recommendations are made as to the methods of land killing which are to be followed on the islands by the Jordan commission, which are indorsed by the Treasury Department. These ideas of Dr. Jordan, if put into practice, will simply continue the wreck and ruin that now exists on the Pribilof fur-seal rookeries and hauling grounds.

Dr. Jordan, in his final report, asserts that all the work of ruin to our herd of fur seals is the work of the pelagic sealer; that no injury to that herd or life has ever resulted from overdriving and killing of young male seals, as practiced on the islands since the herd came into our possession, in 1867.

I know better. I know that the Russians themselves knew better than that in 1820, seventy-nine years ago, and that they then aroused themselves to the truth of injurious effect of overdriving and killing on land, and when, too, at that time, there was no such thing dreamed of even as the work of pelagic sealing, much less done.

When, in 1890, I stopped the work on the Pribilof Islands of land driving and killing, because it was ruinous to the well-being of the herd, a concerted attempt was instantly made in Canada and in Washington to deny my reason for that action, and that attempt has continued to this day. Naturally it does; it will continue just as long as there is a seal to kill on the islands. With the pelagic sealer in the field the dust can be raised over his cruel, wasteful work which will shield and obscure the cruel and wasteful work on the islands. It will conceal most of it from the attention of those who know but little of the business.

Therefore I desire in this connection, and pending the action of Congress, which must pass sooner or later on the question, to throw some light on that particular section of Dr. Jordan's final report which relates to the subject of killing seals on the islands and wherein he denies the fact that any injury has been done—denies it because he knows himself nothing of it and has been obliged to rely upon other authorities. Who? Well, let him answer for himself. I know.

Dr. Jordan has made two basic blunders in the foundation for his statement that no land driving or killing of the young male seals on the Pribilof Islands has ever injured the herd or ever will. His first great mistake is his utter failure to understand the Russian method of driving and killing. He refers to it frequently and incorrectly.

To be brief and explicit, the Russian method of work was radically different from the American system, with special regard to the period of seal driving, sizes of seals taken, and method of curing the green pelts on the islands.

Under the Russian régime the seals were driven in small daily drives all through the season, opening early in June and closing late in November annually. All the seals driven in these drives were taken, with very few exceptions; or, in other words, all the 1, 2, 3, and 4 year old males and all of the females that might be swept up into these drives, after August 10 and 20 to the end of the work in November. The Russians rejected in these drives only the very "short" or small yearlings, and the "patched" or "wigged" bulls, or 5 and 6 year olds. The percentage of this rejection up to August 10 never was more than 2 per cent, and after that not to exceed 5 per cent.

They (the Russians) were compelled to make these small drives on account of their method of curing the pelts before shipment. This they did by air-drying them and not salting them down, as we do, in kenches. So they were able to handle only a few hundred skins daily, where salting would permit the same number of men to handle thousands daily. Air-drying green skins in a damp, foggy atmosphere like that of the Pribilof Islands is a slow and tedious process, because each of these pelts must be "hooped stretched" and "pegged out;" as much time spent on an air-dried pelt as on the curing of ten in salt.

Under the American order, beginning in 1868, the sole use of salt was at once made and the difficult question of time in which to cure the skins on the islands was solved. Then the object became to so drive, at the beginning of the season in June, as to be able to take the skins of 100,000 prime animals before the middle or end of July and then ship the whole catch early in August, so as to have it laid down in London by the middle of October, in good time for the annual Hudson Bay auction sales, which buyers from the entire world attended.

Therefore, the Americans drove up in four weeks, killed and cured as many seals as the Russians would have or could have handled in five months. Also, they were enabled to make by this driving and curing and selection of a particular size or weight of skin that they might determine to take.

With a vast superabundance of seals in 1872-1874 the Americans naturally determined to take nothing out of the driven herds but the very finest animals, and these fine skins were then, as they now are, the hides of the 3 and 4 year old males. The lessees were obliged to pay the same tax on a small, low-priced skin as on a large, fine skin, so they naturally aimed at nothing but the large, fine animals and rejected the small ones, letting them go back from the killing grounds to the sea. Thus began at once, in 1870, the practice of culling all the fine animals out of the driven herds on the killing grounds, which is a practice of infinite harm and sure ruin to the good form and service of the breeding grounds.

The effect of this culling of the driven herds was not more than faintly shadowed out to me in 1872-1874. I saw it then; I made note of it and left word with the Treasury Department to guard against it in my report of 1874. (Condition of Affairs in Alaska, 1875, pp. 75-77.)

Way back as far as 1820 the Russians themselves recognized the fact that they were culling the herds too closely—that they were ruining the business by the of land killing all the choice males—they knew that they alone on the islands were to blame, because no such thing as hunting fur seals in the water by white men then was dreamed of, much less done.

In 1818, and after a period of over ten consecutive years of active driving and culling out of all the largest and very finest young male seals that could annually be secured, the board of directors at St. Petersburg of the Russian-American Company were informed by their agent at Sitka that the supply of these large young male seals had been practically exhausted, and that a smaller grade of skins must be taken or none at all. A trusted associate of the board, General Yanoosky, was sent out by them to go to the Pribilof Islands and investigate and report to them what the exact status of the herd was. This gentleman did so. He arrived on St. Pauls Island in the spring of 1819 and remained there during the whole season, until late in November, when he departed and went down to Sitka, where on the 25th of February, 1820, he finished and forwarded to the board at St. Petersburg his report. A brief of it is given in the papers of the old Russian company and was produced in the counter case of Great Britain, at Paris, as follows:

No. 6.—From the board of administration of the Russian-American Company, under the protection of His Imperial Majesty, to Capt. Matvei Ivanovitch Muravief, etc., chief manager of the Russian-American Colonies.

(No. 175.)

In his Report No. 41, of the 25th February, 1820, Mr. Yanovsky, in giving an account of his inspection of the operations on the islands of St. Paul and St. George, observes that every year the young bachelor seals are killed and that only the cows, "sekatch," and half "sekatch" are left to propagate the species. It follows that only the old seals are left, while if any of the bachelors remain alive in the autumn they are sure to be killed the next spring. The consequence is that the number of seals obtained diminishes every year, and it is certain that the species will in time become extinct.

This view is confirmed by experience. In order to prevent the extinction of the seals it would be well to stop the killing altogether for one season and to give orders that not more than 40,000 are ever to be killed in any one year on the island of St. Paul or more than 10,000 in any one year on the island of St. George.

Mr. Yanovsky considers that if these measures are adopted the number of seals will never diminish. The board of administration, although they concur in Mr. Yanovsky's view, have decided not to adopt the measures proposed by him unless it is found that there is no migration of seals to the two small islands which are believed to exist to the south and north of the chain of islands. * * *

The board would be glad if, when you next go to the islands, you would suggest any measures which you think would tend to improve the fur-seal industry. Should it, however, be impossible for you to visit the islands at present, you will lose no time in giving orders for the rules laid down by this board to be applied forthwith.

MARCH 15, 1821.

A Russian copy of this letter in June, 1874, was given me to read at Unalaska Village, by the Rev. Innokevty Shaieshnikov, the son of the man who entertained and assisted Yanovsky on St. Paul Island, "Bidarsheek" Kazean Shaieshnikov, and then the headman on the island; and I also had from this authentic source, a complete history of the Russian driving and conduct of affairs on those islands during that period of their ownership, and I now submit it in detail. It throws light on the question, and it is Dr. Jordan's misfortune that he was not amenable to its sober and direct teaching. Look at that official record of Yanovsky, and then remember that his recommendation was not adopted. What followed?

In fourteen years only "8,118 fresh young seals, males and females together," were "left alive to breed" on St. Pauls Island. This collapse, due entirely to excessive land killing of young male seals in 1834 was followed by a complete rest of the small remnant of the herd in 1835. Only "100 bachelors" were killed and 3,952 pups for the food of the natives. [I have published this record of the Russian work on the island of St. Paul 1834-1854 in detail in my report of 1890, 54th Cong., 1st sess., H. R. Doc. No. 175.]

Here is this evil of overdriving and culling the herd presented and defined fifty years before I saw it, and nearly seventy years before Jordan denies its existence in 1898. Think of it! We have sent two investigating commissions since 1890 up to our ruined fur-seal preserves on the Pribilof Islands—one in 1891 and the other in 1896-97—and yet, in spite of this plain Russian record and my detailed and unanswerable indictment of that particular abuse in 1890, these commissioners blindly and stupidly deny it. They attempt to set aside the Russian record by saying that the Russians then killed females as well as males and drove them up to the shambles in equal numbers.

The Russians did nothing of the sort. They began the season early in June by driving from the hauling grounds, precisely as we do to-day, and continued so to drive all through the rest of the season. They never went upon the rookeries and drove off the females; they never have done so since 1799. How, then, did the females get into their drives?

The females fell into these drives of the Russians because that work was protracted through the whole season—from June 1 to December 1. In this way the drivers picked up many cows after August 1-10 to the end of November following, since some of these animals during that period leave their places on the breeding grounds and scatter out over large sections of the adjacent hauling grounds, so as to get mixed in here and there with the young males. Thus the Russians in driving across the flanks of the breeding grounds, going from the hauling grounds, during every August, September, October, and November, would sweep up into their drives a certain proportion of female seals which are then scattered out from the rookery organization and are ranging at will over those sections of the hauling grounds driven from. What that proportion of this female life so driven was in Russian time no man to-day can precisely determine. From the best analysis I can make of it, I should say that the Russian female catch in their drives never exceeded 20 per cent of the total number driven at any time, and such times were rare, and that it ranged as low as 5 per cent of female life up to the end of August annually.

Now, what does Jordan say to-day about this work which the Russians condemned seventy years ago and I in 1890?

"As land killing has always been confined to the males, and as its operations are to-day what they have been since the herd came into the American control, except in so far as they have been improved, this means that land killing is not and has not been a factor in the decline of the herd."

I went up in 1890 prejudiced against the pelagic sealer; I am yet; but prejudice can not make answer to the following facts:

In 1890 I found in the place of 3,193,670 breeding fur seals and their young only 959,455.

In the place of a round million of nonbreeding young male seals on the hauling grounds in 1872-1874, I found a scant hundred thousand.

It is, and was, easy to account for the heavy shrinkage of life on the rookeries, for the pelagic sealer has been hard at work on the female life since 1885-86. He has killed in the water 75 to 80 females to every 20 males, and this proportion in killing ought to be shown on the breeding grounds. It was.

But what about that infinitely greater loss among the young males on the hauling grounds? If the pelagic sealer was all to blame (as Jordan says he is) for this ruin of the herd, why should this class of seals, of which he kills the fewest, be the one class most fearfully decimated?

I began on the ground in 1890 to review every season's work on the islands since 1874. I found that in 1883 the supply of surplus male seals had so dwindled on the islands that the driving was then extended to all of the hauling fields; that extension declared increased difficulty in getting the supply long before the pelagic sealer had entered Bering Sea or had really begun destructive work in the North Pacific Ocean.

If the pelagic sealer had not caused this trouble on the islands in 1883-1887 of getting the full supply of killable young male seals, what had? An epidemic or disease? No, not a trace of it. Then there remained but two reasonable answers; either too many seals were annually killed by the lessees, or the method of driving to cull the herds so driven was at fault.

The effect of killing annually 100,000 young male seals of a single high grade upon the whole herd as begun in 1870 was an experiment. It went far beyond the Russian limit and method, for it added a much greater danger. It called for the systematic culling out of all the seals driven under 3 years of age and over 4 years.

This act of steadily killing every fine 3-year-old and 4-year-old male that comes up annually in the drives began in a few years to create a serious interference with that law of natural selection in the life of the herd which enables the fur seal to be so dominant a pinniped. This interference is at once seen by a thoughtful naturalist when the continued culling of the very finest young male seals out from the herd takes place annually. How long would any stock breeder keep up the standard of his herd in this State if he annually slaughtered all of the very finest young males that were born into it or brought into it?

Yet Dr. Jordan comes forward in his final report with this plain confession of his inability to grasp a well-established truth in regard to the life of wild animals. Listen to him (Chap. IX, p. 128):

"The whole matter (theory of overdriving) is too absurd for serious consideration, and might be passed by with the silent contempt which it deserves were it not for the fact that it was accepted by the British commissioners in 1891 and made the chief foundation of the British contention before the Paris tribunal of arbitration."

Yet, curiously enough, Dr. Jordan, on page 120, immediately preceding this dogmatic deduction, cuts all the ground out from under his own feet in the following statement:

"But suppose the killing was continued through a series of years, every 3-year-old being killed, the reserve would in time be cut off, and the stock of breeding bulls die out. It is impossible to say how long it would take to produce this effect, because we do not know the length of the life of a bull. We may infer, however, that it is not less than fifteen years; and therefore the injurious effects of this excessive killing, begun in any given year and continued indefinitely, would not be seen within ten years at least."

This he publishes under the caption of "A hypothetical case."

It is not hypothetical; it is the real story of the driving and killing on the islands from 1880 up to 1890. During all those years I know, from the records of the work, and the direct personal testimony of the men who did the work, that they never allowed a 3-year-old seal to escape that they could get. That in 1883 they first began to fall behind in their run of 3-year-old seals from the hunting grounds of 1872-1874, which had so abundantly supplied them. Then they began to extend their driving to the hitherto untouched hauling grounds of the islands, until, by 1896, they were driving from every nook and corner on the islands where a young male seal hauled out, and by 1889, in spite of the frantic exertions that they made, they got less than one-quarter of their quota of 3-year-old skins. They had to make it up in yearlings and "short" 2-year-olds for that year.

In the face of this positive truth about the work of 1889, which appears in my report of 1890, Dr. Jordan, in 1898, makes the following strange blunder of statement: "To destroy this class (3-year-olds) or any considerable number of them would at once weaken the herd. But there would be no object in such killing, and it has never been thought of." (P. 120.)

Never been thought of! Why, it was the sole aim and thought of the land butchers to get every fine 3-year-old and 4-year-old seal that could be secured in the seal drives from 1872 to 1890. When the supply of this grade dwindled on the original sources of supply, then the work of driving from the hitherto untouched reservoirs was regularly increased, with vigor and tireless persistency.

But Dr. Jordan makes his case still worse, for he goes on to say that this overkilling is not practicable. On page 121 he declares: "In the hypothetical case above cited we have supposed that every male of a given age could be taken. While in theory this is possible, in practice it could probably never be done. There are certain hauling grounds, such as Lagoon, Zapadnie Head, Otter Island, Silvitah Rock, and Southwest Point, from which the seals have not, and never have been driven. The young males frequenting there were left undisturbed."

This emphatic statement by Dr. Jordan is wholly and completely untrue. I have the record and the proof that each and every one of these places of retreat which he names above have been annually visited by the sealing gangs on Dr. Paul Island since 1884; and these "undisturbed" seals have been regularly driven off from those particular places, so that they would haul out on other places where they could be taken more advantageously, or they were killed, thousands and tens of thousands of them, right on the ground itself, notably on South West Point in 1884-1886. They were entirely hunted off from Otter Island, because the law and the lease does not allow the lessees to kill seals there. And this particular secret work was in progress right up to the hour when I stopped it, July 20, 1890.

Now, who has imposed upon Dr. Jordan with this bald untruth? Who has so completely and shamefully misled him? What avails his high personal character or his deserved reputation as a naturalist when he makes a gross and a monumental blunder like this? A blunder upon which he bases his whole defense of an abuse, which I condemn. Right at this point and in this connection Dr. Jordan, in part 3 of his report (p. 330), makes the following remarkable self-contradiction of what he asserts, as quoted above:

"In the matter of branding, also, we may note it is of the utmost importance to the Government to know just what proportion of breeding males are necessary for its herd. This fact once known, it then becomes equally important to see that the proper number of young males are reserved for the replenishment of the breeding stock. Under present conditions the matter of securing this reserve is left more or less to chance. There is no evidence that the 3-year-old which is allowed to escape from one drive will not be taken in the next.

Here is his own admission, in his own words, of the precise and perfect truth of my indictment of the methods of land killing, which he denies in Volume I, Chapter IX, page 128. Small wonder that the Canadians profited by their association with him.

This close approach under Russian order to total destruction of the fur seal herd in 1834, from the results of excessive driving and culling out of all the choice young male seals since 1817, makes an authoritative and positive denial of the "scientific" investigations of our agents in 1891—"experts," as they were officially termed—and of Dr. Jordan's conclusions as to land killing in 1896-97. These figures of that Russian period of destruction make also a most eloquent and significant contrast with those of our own time of decline, and they are herewith submitted.

They constitute a deadly parallel, both for the scientists above mentioned and for the seals.

These Russian records of the ill results of their abuse in driving only to take the very finest young males, and these failing in supply then to take everything, are not as specific as they undoubtedly were when first sent to the general manager at Sitka from the islands. It can be easily understood that under the pressure of the demand for these skins by the board of directors, all the reports showing the need of "resting" or of checking the kill ing on the islands would be toned down as much as possible, even to suppressing them altogether.

But they were specific enough for a competent investigator to make good use of; they were so clear to my mind that in 1874 I thought them valuable, and I translated and published them in the body of my report for that year, and republished them in my finished work of 1880. I regarded them as notes of warning way back in those early days of our management of the business, well worthy of notice. (Condition of Affairs in Alaska: Washington, 1875, pp. 107-120.)

In the classification of skins taken on the islands as exhibted in the table herewith submitted, the terms are: "Prime" skins are 3 and 4 year olds, "short" skins are 2-year-olds, "eyeplasters" are 1-year-olds, all male fur seals.

The Russian figures in the following table are taken from the work of Bishop Venianimov, Zapieska ob Oonalashkenskaho Otdayla, St. Petersburg, 1842; Vol. II, p. 568, et seq.

Those relating to our own time and work, 1889-1901, are from the trade catalogues of the London sales, where the Alaskan skins have all been sold at public auction since 1871. The significant classification of sizes annually taken on the islands, which declares that in 1901 we were draining the dregs of the male life, is found in these records of the London sales, and there is no appeal from the perfect truth of the figures.

NOTE.—In 1834 only "8,118 young seals, males and females, were left alive to breed" on St. Pauls Island. The Russians stopped the killing in 1835 and thus prevented the extermination of the species.

By 1907 we will reach the end of the young male life on the islands; and by 1910 the female life will have followed it, on account of lack of service and the pelagic hunter.

THE "TRAMPLED PUP" BLUNDER.

After failing in this report, as I have shown above, to correctly grasp the truth as to the form and number of the fur-seal herd in 1872-1874, and failing to appreciate the deadly effect of overdriving and culling the young male seals, Dr. Jordan's next blunder in relative importance, is his amazing mistake as to the cause of the death of the pup seals, which he persisted in announcing in 1896, and then again, though modified greatly, in 1897. I refer to his "discovery" that the "natural check on the increase of life" on these rookeries is the annual trampling to death of the young or baby seals by their parents on the ground of their birth!

So possessed was Dr. Jordan by the belief in this nonsense of "trampled" pups when he returned from his first season's visit (after spending just twenty-seven days in this "thorough work") on the Pribilof Islands that he refused to modify the amazing folly of it, but actually induced or directed his associates to announce the "discovery" to the scientific world by its assertion at a regular meeting of the Biological Society of Washington early in January, 1897. This announcement thus formally made was publicly approved by Jordan's associates on the Commission at the meeting, and discussed as a new factor of the greatest importance to a correct understanding of the seal question. I alone on that occasion took the floor and disputed the truth of it and denied it, and with my emphatic denial the session adjourned.

Present at that meeting was Dr. Charles W. Stiles, who heard me, and who was impressed by my saying that better knowledge would show the presence of some disease among those "trampled" pups, which were described that evening as dead and counted, and that they never came to death by reason of being crushed beneath the bodies and flippers of their parents, as the half dozen speakers who preceded me all united in affirming.

Dr. Stiles revolved the subject in his mind and investigated the specimens brought down to the National Museum of these "trampled" pups and their viscera. He discovered the true cause of their death, and then announced it. He said it was due to the ravages of the worm Uncinaria, which is an intestinal parasite that often destroys sheep, foxes, and kindred life, and, indeed, a variety of it destroys human life.

This ought to have completely settled Jordan and his "trampled" pup "discovery." It did, but Jordan has gathered together a few fragments of his exploded theory, and feebly insists upon its recognition as a minor and not a major cause of loss of life among the pups. He makes this admission and correction, however, without giving the credit to Dr. Stiles which that gentleman deserves. He says (p. 70):

"In our investigations of the subject of mortality among the pups in 1896, which were begun late, we assumed that the chief cause of death among the 11,000 pups counted before the middle of August was the trampling of the fighting bulls. The more thorough investigations of 1897, however, prove this an error. The principal cause of death was found to be a small parasitic worm of the genus Uncinaria, which infests sandy areas, and the ground has become filthy."

But in spite of this admission of his blunder, pointed out by myself before it was in type, and after that forced on him by Dr. Stiles, he still makes the following furtive suggestion that there is "a certain number" of the pups crushed to death by their parents:

"In our experience we have seen them stand hard knocks and even come off from under the feet of the bulls uninjured. * * * But when the little pup is only a few days old it is a very different matter. In the rushes of the clumsy bull, in his efforts to defend or discipline his harem, a certain number of the little fellows are crushed to death before they are old enough to get away and pod by themselves." (P. 70.)

This is precisely what I have described in detail (Mono Seal Islands, p. 38), and I have made no hesitation in saying that a few of these pups are crushed, and that "it seems questionable whether more than 1 per cent of all the pups born each season on these great rookeries of the Pribilof Islands are destroyed in this manner on the breeding grounds."

The "certain number" of trampled pups which Dr. Jordan vaguely hints at is a ridiculous one in the aggregate, and amounts to less now than when I noted it first of all men, in 1872, and described it in 1874. (Condition of Affairs in Alaska, p. 138.)

Now, let us analyze the loss from the ravages of the intestinal worm Uncinaria, which Jordan, with strange imprudence, declares to be the "chief natural cause of death among pups, so far as known at present." [Joint statement of conclusions (item 5), signed November 16, 1897, p. 242, Pt. I.] Every detail of the report and record of finding the worm-killed pups by Dr. Jordan and his assistants, season of 1896-97, locates all of the carcasses on the sandy portions of the breeding grounds; the other sections of the rookeries were free from any evidence of dead pups which amounted to more than my description of such loss in 1872-1874, viz, 1 per cent.

The sandy areas of the Pribilof breeding grounds I determined with great exactitude in 1872-1874; they then amounted to less than one twenty-third of the whole breeding area, viz: Entire superficial area of the breeding grounds, seasons of 1872-1874, Pribilof Islands, was 6,386,840 square feet, the sandy areas of which contained 275,850 square feet, or only one twenty-third of the whole, and these areas are the same to-day—no more or no less in extent.

Therefore Jordan's "chief natural cause of death" is limited by the facts that attend it to a little fraction only of that life which Jordan says it destroys, and it really becomes insignificant; but Dr. Jordan's Canadian associates have taken infinite satisfaction and comfort out of this mistaken stand of Jordan, whereby they escape any direct or indirect impalement on the one real and true cause of that shame and misery which marks the conduct of affairs on the Seal Islands to-day. I allude to the starvation of the pups, thousands and tens of thousands of them, on the rookeries every year for the reason of their mothers being killed at sea by Canadian hunters. So completely have the Canadian agents handled Jordan in this matter that he omits the slightest mention of this particular shame and cruel loss and waste of life in the body of any one of the sixteen items of his "joint statement" with them, cited above.

THE BRANDING BLUNDER.

The fourth blunder in relative importance of the many blunders strung on the wire of Dr. Jordan's report is the puerile and abortive work which he instituted and authorized—seasons of 1896-97—in the matter of branding cow and pup fur seals. Under head of Chapter XIV (pt. 3, pp. 325-331) Dr. Jordan goes into the details of this idle business and gives his unqualified approval to pup branding as a means of destroying the value of the fur-seal skins, so as to drive the pelagic sealer out of business and thus protect and restore the herd!

The complete failure of this business, both in its application to the seals and to the pelagic sealer, has followed since the date of his report, February 24, 1898. The cruel farce of torturing baby seals, many of them at the time of branding without mothers, and starving to death in September and October, has been abandoned on the islands. The folly of it became so rank that even the timid officialism that had it in hand after Jordan left the islands rebelled.

I protested before the Ways and Means Committee, February 18, 1896 (during the progress of a hearing) against this attempt being made to brand these seals, as suggested in 1895, seriously, by Mr. C. S. Hamlin, and I gave the best reason of all reasons for dropping the scheme when I said that even if the seals were branded—all of them—the pelagic hunter would stick to his business until the last one of them was taken. A brand will not depreciate the value of a skin so marked more than 5 per cent or 10 per cent at the most, and in most cases not affect it at all.

The dressers of skins can unhair and prepare a branded skin just as easily as they can one not so treated, and far easier than they can dress a skin cut and torn by the bullets and spear prongs of the pelagic hunter. These dressed skins, ready for the furriers and makers, are then all purposely cut, in the making up and fitting of garments, into strips, ribbons, and right-angled pieces, which are sewed together again in order that the seams shall constitute ribs, as it were, for the thin skin, upon which it will not stretch out of shape or tear apart under pressure by the form of the wearer, as they would do if not so treated.

Understanding this procedure, it becomes at once evident that any skin with a patch on it bare of fur—say the area of a brandmark, i. e., 6 inches by 2—will not interfere in the slightest with the work of making it up, and that area of branding will be simply cut out and thrown aside, entailing a loss at the most of not more than a fiftieth of the superficial area of the dressed skin; in short, the loss is nil.

The Canadian hunter has paid less attention to Dr. Jordan's branding scheme than he has to any one of the hundreds of obstacles that continually arise during the progress of his work, such as the vagaries of his vessel, his crew, his hunters, his weather, good, bad, and otherwise. In all of these he constantly finds serious setbacks, but, nevertheless, he never lets up, and he has been reaping a richer reward than ever from the proceeds of his business since Dr. Jordan first shook these branding irons at him; and, as Jordan has left the case in joint agreement with the Canadian agents, the pelagic sealer has an indefinite future of good return from his calling at our expense, providing we do not agree with Jordan, let the matter rest.

Having put these glaring and salient mistakes of Dr. Jordan into the light, so that they are easily recognized, I do not think it necessary to dissect and exhibit any more of them, since this exposure of the most mischievous ones renders the lesser blunders of no relative importance.

There remains, however, the crowning folly and greatest mischief of his work to deal with and properly analyze. That chief blunder and source of regret is the "joint statement of conclusions respecting the fur-seal herd frequenting the Pribilof Islands in Bering Sea," which he signed with his British associates in our State Department November 16, 1897. He has literally lived up to his promise, made February 28, 1897, that he has a "perfect agreement" with the British agents, for he has agreed to everything that was agreeable to them in this smooth paper, and nothing else.

THE CHIEF BLUNDER.

I have alluded to a peculiarity of Dr. Jordan in publishing the results of his work, by which he unwittingly introduces evidence of his own approval in one portion of the report that completely denies the truth of some statement of fact which he had made previously. This incoherent and slovenly habit is resultant of nothing in the end for its author but mortification and discredit. Illustrative of this, note the following:

The end of Dr. Jordan's work and association with the fur-seal question came over his signature to a "joint agreement" with his British peer in this business, dated November 16, 1897.

This "agreement" is an amazing exhibition of Dr. Jordan. It is a sad, most extraordinary, but, unhappily, it is a true picture of the man, since Dr. Jordan is his own accuser, and utters his own sentence.

On page 184 (Part I), under the caption of "Chapter XIV—Summary of conclusions," Dr. Jordan says:

"Before passing to a consideration of the final topic, the remedy for the condition of the herd, we may give the following brief statement of the chief facts concerning the fur-seal herd, which have a bearing on its future protection and preservation. This statement while in a sense a summary of the preceding discussions, was originally prepared by Messrs Hamlin and Jordan, the American delegates to the recent fur-seal conference at Washington, for the use of the conference. A few of the estimates here given may be open to difference of opinion, but in general the accuracy of these statements has not been questioned and can not be."

He follows this preface here with 20 detailed items of fact which he says "can not be successfully" questioned. (Pp. 184-186.)

In order that the complete, abject surrender of these "chief facts" by Dr. Jordan to the British agents may be seen at once, and the act of that denial by their author be recognized beyond contradiction, I submit what he publishes as "facts prepared for the use of this conference" and what he actually signed as "facts" in that conference.

EXHIBIT B.

The surrender of the case of the United States in re fur-seal herd of the Pribilof Islands by David Starr Jordan and Charles S. Hamlin, commissioners in behalf of the United States, made by their signatures to a "Joint statement of conclusions," November 16, 1897, with the British agents, Professor Thompson and Mr. Macoun, in the State Department, Washington.

The evidence of that surrender to the Canadians is given from the report of Professor Jordan, submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury February 24, 1898, and is herein produced by putting his "Statements of facts" (Chap. XVI, pp. 184-186) item by item against his "Joint statement of conclusions" (Appendix II, pp. 240-244), as published in said report (The Fur Seals and Fur Seal Islands of the North Pacific Ocean), prepared and annotated by Henry W. Elliott, April 10, 1902.

STATEMENTS OF FACT.	JOINT STATEMENT OF CONCLUSIONS.
Jordan prepared the following "for the use of the conference." (Pp. 184-186 final report, Chap. XVI of Fur-Seal Investigation, Pt. I.]	Jordan, in the conference on 16th November, 1897, signed the following radical disagreements to his "statements of fact." (Pp. 241-244, Appendix II, final report of Fur-Seal Investigation, Pt. I.)
1. Since the year 1885 the fur-seal herd, as measured by it breeding females, has steadily declined in numbers.	1. "There is adequate evidence that since the year 1884 * * * the fur-seal herd as measured on either the hauling grounds or the breeding grounds has declined in numbers." * * * [The year 1884 is substituted for 1885.]
2. The best available measure of this decline is found in these facts.	2. "In the absence of earlier counts of actual counts of the rookeries such as have been made in recent years, the best approximate measure of decline now available is found in these facts."
a During the period between 1871 and 1885 no difficulty was experienced in obtaining each year 100,000 male seals of recognized killable age by the 20th July.	a About 100,000 male seals of recognized killable age were obtained from the hauling grounds each year from 1871 to 1889. The table of statistics shows on the whole a progressive increase in the number of hauling grounds driven and the number of drives made, as well as a retardation of the date at which the quota was attained during a number of years previous to 1889. [Observe that "no difficulty" is struck out, and the admission is made that increased work to get the seals was the fact.]
	b In 1896 only 30,000 killable seals were taken after continuing the driving until July 27, and in 1897 only 20,890 were taken after continuing the driving until August 11."
3. From this and other data it would appear that the herd of breeding females on the Pribilof Islands in the years 1871-1885 must have been about five times as great as at present, or from 600,000 to 700,000 in number.
4. The natural life of the female fur seal is estimated at from ten to fifteen years. Assuming thirteen years as an average, each female would have ten years of breeding life. If this be true, 10 per cent of the breeding females die of old age each winter, in addition to the unknown losses from other causes. The stock of breeding females is recruited solely by the accession each year of 3-year-old cows. This is struck out completely from the "agreement," and No. 5 taken up as 4.
5. The natural death rate among the young fur seals, especially among the pups, is very great. At present about two-thirds die from natural causes before they reach the age of 3 years, or killable age for the males and breeding age for the females.
6. The chief natural causes of death among the pups are:
(a) Ravages of the parasitic worm Uncinaria, infesting sandy breeding areas.
(b) Trampling by fighting or moving bulls and cows.
(c) Starvation of pups strayed or separated from their mothers when very young.
(d) Ravages of the great killer (Orca).
(e) Drowning in the storms of winter.
The natural loss from other causes are relatively very small.
7. Counts and estimates show that the number of breeding females bearing pups on the rookeries of St. Paul and St. George in 1896 was about 157,000 and in 1897 about 130,000.
8. On certain rookeries pups were counted during both seasons. Where 16,241 were found in 1896, 14,318 were found in 1897, a decrease of about 12 per cent. The harems on all the rookeries were counted during both seasons. In 1896 there were 4,932; in 1897 4,418, a decrease of 10.41 per cent. The cows actually present on certain rookeries at the height of the season were counted both seasons. Where 10,198 were found in 1896, 7,307 were found in 1897, a decrease of 28.34 per cent.
	b In the year 1896, 28,964 killable seals were taken after continuing the driving until July 27, and in 1897, 19,189 after continuing the driving till August 11. We have reason to believe that during the period 1896 and 1897 a very much larger number of males of recognized killable age could have been taken on the hauling grounds."
	"The reduction between the years 1896 and 1897 in the number of killable seals, while an indication of decrease in the breeding herd, can not be taken as an actual measure of such decrease. A number of other factors must be taken into consideration, and the real measure of decrease must be sought in more pertinent statistics drawn from the breeding rookeries themselves."
	[Observe that this item utterly contradicts its original and denies it.]
	3. From these data it is plain that the former yield of the hauling grounds of the Pribilof Islands was from three to five times as great as in the years 1896 and 1897, and the same diminution to one-third and one-fifth of the former product may be assumed when we include also the results of hunting at sea.
	[Observe that "the herd of breeding females" is struck out, and a negation inserted in lieu of the original "fact."]
	4. The death rate among the young fur seals, especially among the pups, is very great. While the loss among the pups prior to their departure from the islands has been found in the last two years to approach 20 per cent of the whole number born, and though the rate of subsequent mortality is unknown, we may gather from the number which return each year that from one-half to two-thirds have perished before the age of 3 years—that is to say, the killable age for the males and the breeding age for the females.
	[Observe that 20 per cent loss is added to the original "fact."]
	5. The chief natural causes of death among pups, so far as known at present, are as follows, the importance of each being variable and more or less uncertain:
	(a) Ravages of the parasitic worm Uncinaria, most destructive on the sandy breeding areas and during the period from July 15 to August 20.
	(b) Trampling by fighting bulls or by moving bulls and cows, a source of loss greatest among young pups.
	(c) Starvation of pups strayed or separated from their mothers when very young, or whose mothers have died from natural causes.
	(d) The ravages of the great killer (Orca), known to be fatal to many of the young and perhaps also to older seals.
	At a later period in the storms of winter drowning of the pups is believed to be a source of loss among the older ones, but not certainly known.
	[Observe the fact that the starvation of the pups caused by the death of their mothers by pelagic hunting is not even hinted at in this statement, and despite the fact that it is the one great single cause of loss well and positively known on the islands since 1894! This is a sad omission for Dr. Jordan; it reflects upon him seriously.]
	6. Counts of certain rookeries with partial counts and estimates of others show that the number of breeding females bearing pups on St. Paul and St. George was in 1896 and 1897 between 160,000 and 130,000, more nearly approaching the higher figure in 1896 and the lower in 1897.
	7. On certain rookeries where pups were counted in both seasons, 16,241 being found in 1896 and 14,318 in 1897, or applying a count adopted by Professor Thompson, 14,734 in the latter year, there is evident a decrease of 9 or 12 per cent within the twelve months in question. The count of pups is the most trustworthy measure of the numerical variation in the herd. The counts of harems, and especially of cows present, are much inferior in value. The latter counts, however, point in the same direction. The harems on all the rookeries were counted in both seasons. In 1896 there were 4,932; in 1897 there were 4,418, a

9. It is not possible to state absolutely the decline in the actual number of breeding cows from 1896 to 1897, but it is not far from 15 per cent.

10. The number of killable seals taken on the islands in 1897 shows a decrease of about 30 per cent from the number taken in 1896. This represents, approximately, the decrease in 3-year-old breeders which entered the rookeries in 1897, the number of males and females born being practically equal.

11. Land killing is not now a factor in the decline of the herd, and has not been since the islands came into the possession of the United States. It has not caused injury to the breeding herd, either by undue reduction in number of males, or by impairing their virility, or in any other way.

12. Land killing has tended to increase the breeding herd by the reduction of the number of adult bulls and their consequent fighting, which results in the destruction of females and pups.

13. No appreciable part of the decline of the herd is due to illegal killing or killing in defiance of the regulations of the Paris award.

14. The reduction in the breeding herd has been due to the killing of females at sea, with the resulting starvation of nursing pups and the destruction of unborn pups.

15. Pelagic sealing necessarily involves indiscriminate killing of males and females. The greater proportion of the animals taken in the pelagic catch are females. The statistics for the American catch, obtained by expert examination in the custom-houses, show an average of 78 per cent for the years 1894, 1895, 1896. The examination of pelagic skins in London confirms this percentage.

16. The natural increase of the breeding herd is about 16½ per cent each year, being one-half of the surviving 3-year-olds. The natural death rate from old age each year is not far from 10 per cent. The death rate of adults from other causes can not be accurately estimated. The killing of females by the hand of man, therefore, can not reach 6½ per cent of the total decrease of 10.41 per cent. The cows actually present on certain rookeries at the height of the season were counted in both seasons. Where 10,198 were found in 1896, 7,307 were found in 1897, a decrease of 28.34 per cent.

ment strikes out any regard for the

[Observe the fact that this agree-accuracy of the harem or cow counts and their showing of loss.]

8. It is not easy to apply the various counts in the form of a general average to all of the rookeries of the islands. We recognize that a notable decrease has been suffered by the herd during the twelvemonth 1896 to 1897 without attempting, save by setting the above numbers on record, to ascribe to the decrease more precise figures.

[Observe that no agreement as to any percentage of loss is made here—will not be entertained.]

10. This is struck out entirely from the agreement. Jordan surrenders it.

9. The methods of driving and killing practiced on the islands as they have come under our observation during the past two years call for no criticism or objection. "An adequate supply of bulls is present on the rookeries. The number of older bachelors rejected in the drives during the period in question is such as to safeguard in the immediate future a similarly adequate supply. The breeding bulls, females, and pups on the breeding rookeries are not disturbed. There is no evidence or sign or impairment by driving of the virility of the males. The operations of driving and killing are conducted skillfully and without inhumanity."

[Observe the fact that this agreement covers only two years—the "past two years"—and will not stand for more than the "immediate future." It is a complete denial of the claim which Jordan makes in his "Facts" and expressed so clearly in this item (11).]

12. Struck out entirely by the "Agreement." A sensible act, even if the Canadians did so.

10. The pelagic industry is conducted in an orderly manner and in a spirit of acquiescence in the limitations imposed by law.

[Certainly; why should these "regulations" be violated when they themselves facilitate the operations of the pelagic sealer and protect him? This is a great bit of Bunsbyism in such a document.]

14. This item of "fact" is struck out and omitted entirely from this agreement.

11. Pelagic sealing involves the killing of males and females alike, without discrimination, and in proportion as the two sexes coexist in the sea. The reduction of males effected on the islands causes an enhanced proportion of females to be found in the pelagic catch; hence this proportion, if it varies from no other cause, varies at least with the catch upon the islands.

In 1895 Mr. A. B. Alexander, on behalf of the Government of the United States, found 62.3 per cent of females in the catch of the Dora Sieward in Bering Sea, and in 1896, Mr. Andrew Hackett, in behalf of the Canadian government, found 84.2 per cent in the catch of the same schooner in the same sea. There are, no doubt, instances, especially in the seasons of migrations and on the course of the migrating herds, of catches containing a very different proportion of the two sexes.

[Observe the complete denial of the "fact" as set forth in item 15, and its effect in this "agreement."]

16. Struck out entirely, and in its place the following items, 12, 13, and 14, are inserted, which deny the conclusion of this item of "fact:"

number each year without involving the decline of the herd. If the herd is to be restored, the killing of female seals should not be permitted.

17. As neither land killing nor sea killing now yields a profit for the money invested and for the money spent in protection, the fur-seal herd is therefore, from a commercial point of view, virtually destroyed. But this has not involved the biological destruction of the herd. Under wise protection it may regain its former numbers.

18. In our judgment, all facts in any way vital to international action regarding the protection and preservation of the fur-seal herd are now in the possession of both Governments.

19. These facts show that the herd has largely declined from its original condition, and from its condition in 1891 and 1894; that it is still declining, and that the cause of the decline is the slaughter of females involved in pelagic sealing.

20. The regulations of the Paris award have proved ineffective to preserve the herd. They have not prevented its decline, which has continued and must continue in spite of them. They can not bring about a restoration of the herd, as they permit the killing of females in numbers vastly in excess of their natural increase.

But the crowning and supreme error in this item (16) of agreement is the declaration that under existing law, regulations, and trade conditions the fur-seal species is in no danger of extermination.

It is passing out rapidly from existence; and in not less than four more

12. The large proportion of females in the pelagic catch includes not only adult females that are both nursing and pregnant, but also young seals that are not pregnant, and others that have not yet brought forth young, with such also as have recently lost their young through the various causes of natural mortality.

[Observe the "dust" over truth here.]

13. The polygamous habit of the animal, coupled with an equal birth rate of the two sexes, permits a large number of males to be removed with impunity from the herd, while, as with other animals, any similar abstraction of females checks or lessens the herd's increase, or, when carried further, brings about an actual diminution of the herd. It is equally plain that a certain number of females may be killed without involving an actual diminution of the herd, if the number killed do not exceed the annual increment of the breeding herd, taking into consideration the annual losses by death through old age, and through incidents at sea.

[Observe the fact that Jordan here knowingly signs an agreement that permits the killing of females, so as not to allow the restoration of the herd which he asks for in item 16.]

14. While whether from consideration of the birth rate or from an inspection of the visible effects it is manifest that the take of females in recent years has been so far in excess of the natural increment as to lead to a reduction of the herd in the degree related above, yet the ratio of the pelagic catch of one year to that of the following has fallen off more rapidly than the ratio of the breeding herd of one year to the breeding herd of the next.

[Observe, pelagic sealing has ceased to harm!]

18. This item of "fact" struck out completely.

19. In this greater reduction of the pelagic catch compared with the gradual decrease of the herd, there is a tendency toward equilibrium, or a stage at which the numbers of the breeding herd would neither increase or decrease. In considering the probable size of the herd in the immediate future, there remains to be estimated the additional factor of decline resulting from reductions in the number of surviving pups, caused by the larger pelagic catch of 1894 and 1895.

[Observe the complete denial of the "fact" in item 19 by this astonishing agreement as to an "equilibrium!" Not only has the pelagic catch increased in 1899 and 1900 from 24,332 seals in 1897, when this paper was signed, to 35,000 and 35,690 in those years, respectively, but the herd has steadily declined up to date.]

20. This item is struck out completely from this agreement.

16. The diminution of the herd is yet far from a stage which involves or threatens the actual extermination of the species so long as it is protected in its haunts on land. It is not possible during the continuance of the conservative methods at present in force upon the islands, with the further safeguard of the protected zone at sea, that any pelagic killing should accomplish this final end. There is evidence, however, that in its present condition the herd yields an inconsiderable return either to the lessees of the islands or to the owners of the pelagic fleet.

[Observe this ridiculous result in "agreement," after two seasons of study of the subject by Jordan; observe the positive negation of each and every order to stop pelagic sealing which Jordan has signed, and observe the utter and silly error of statement as to profits of the pelagic seasons from date (April, 1902) the male life on the islands will be completely destroyed, and the female life, with the birth rate cut off by result of operation of natural law, will follow it, in spite of all that we can do, unless we act now.

sealer: The profits of these hunters in 1898, following this agreement, were 20 per cent gerater than in 1897; in 1899 they were 50 per cent greater; in 1900 they were 150 per cent greater, and this season of 1901 they have been 145 per cent greater. (See Exhibit H, ante.)]

Note, supplemental.—When this joint agreement as to conclusions was signed at the State Department, and before the ink was dry, the following advice of it was at once given to Lord Salisbury by Professor Thompson, who was stated to be in "perfect agreement" with Dr. Jordan by that gentleman (Dr. Jordan) himself in a letter to Senator PERKINS, which was read in the Senate of the United States February 28, 1897. The utter inability of Jordan to understand his British associate can be well understood by the following copy (Blue Book, "U. S. No. 2, 1898"):

The British agent regrets that the herd has decreased in 1897, and also that the pelagic industry has declined in still greater ratio!

WASHINGTON, November 16, 1897.

MY LORD: I have the honor to transmit to your lordship a joint statement of conclusions regarding the present herd of the Pribilof Islands, which has to-day been completed and signed by all the delegates.

Your lordship will perceive that we agreed upon specific statements that a certain number of females may be taken without actually diminishing the herd, that the diminution of the herd is far from a stage involving or threatening the extermination of the species, and that under the methods in force on the islands, and safeguarded by the protected zone at sea, pelagic sealing can never accomplish this final end; further, that the pelagic industry is conducted in orderly manner and in a spirit of acquiescence in the limitations imposed by law. On the other hand, we have, unhappily, to record a decrease in the herd and a still greater decrease of the pelagic industry.

I have, etc.,

D'ARCY W. THOMPSON.

This is the sum of the scientific labor of Dr. Jordan during 1896-97, and this is the best understanding which he and his associates have been able to arrive at. While the fur-seal species of Alaska is actually passing, under his eyes, out of all existence on those islands, he is unable to see it; he is unable to grasp the self-evident truths of the past records of this business, and to observe their reappearance on the ground to-day under existing law, regulations, and conditions.

The young male life on the rookeries is drained to the dregs at the present hour, but unless we stop the work of the pelagic hunter, there is no sense or reason in stopping our work of killing on the islands. To do so would simply be to save life there for the Canadian hunter to indecently slaughter at sea, and merely prolong the cruel and shameful extermination of the species which is sure to ensue if that hunter is not suppressed.

If we step in and kill off the surplus female life ourselves, down to a margin of ten or twelve thousand, that, at once, will put the pelagic hunter out of business, and at the same time it warrants us in saving the right proportion of choice young male life on the breeding grounds, which we must save at once or else lose the life itself.

Killing these female seals ourselves, harsh as it may seem in the abstract, is, in fact, an act of the greatest mercy to the herd, since it eliminates the extreme brutality of the pelagic hunter's work. It anticipates and prevents the slow torture to death of tens of thousands of helpless young seals which is officially observed and counted every season now by our agents under existing law.

It is but one killing, and the work ends, if we do it; if not done by us, then this infamous butchery of the pelagic hunter will continue year after year in the future, as it has prevailed year after year since 1893, and will only end by the total destruction of the species in 1906-7.

In short, if we do not stop by the method of this seal bill that work of the pelagic hunter, then we can not ask our people to stop their work on the islands; it is manifestly wrong and useless to do so. If we do not stop the pelagic sealer, then the swift extermination, total and complete, of this remnant of the Alaskan fur-seal herd is right at hand, owing to the combined operation of natural and unnatural causes.

HENRY W. ELLIOTT.

LAKEWOOD, NEAR CLEVELAND, OHIO, December 3, 1901.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this picture of the "thorough performance" of the work of the Jordan-Thompson commission is drawn true to life, and it illustrates in sharp, clear outline the folly of sending inexperienced men up to investigate a subject on the seal islands about which they knew nothing prior to their appointment, and it also clearly shows that such agents succeed only in the direction of making confusion worse confounded; that they wreck and ruin a good cause.

In this connection it is only right that I give to the House the genesis of this mischievous work of the Jordan-Thompson commission, and an epitomized account of the progress of those "negotiations" which Mr. Olney assured the Senate (March, 1896) would enable him to better the shameful order of affairs on the seal islands of Alaska. It was upon his assurance of success that the Senate did not pass the seal bill now pending, though it was favorably reported from the Foreign Relations Committee and placed on the Calendar March 4 and made a special order for March 16, 2 p. m.

EXHIBIT C.

Being extracts from the official records showing the progress of the failure of our agents to revise, alter, or amend the regulations of the Bering Sea tribunal, 1895-1897.

The following chronological analysis is an official exhibit of the abortive negotiation of the agents of the United States in the matter of the amendment of the costly and useless regulations of the Bering Sea tribunal, and for which the Dingley seal bill was dropped, while pending in the Senate, March 16, 1896, at the request of Richard Olney, Secretary of State, who asked that it be abandoned, since he was then successfully "negotiating" with Great Britain, and its passage would "greatly embarrass him, if not defeat these negotiations," etc.

[Taken from the British Blue Book, "United States, No. 4, 1897."]

March 11, 1896.—Richard Olney, Secretary of State, informs the British minister that "28,000 seal pups died on the Pribilof Islands during the past season from starvation, their mothers having been killed at sea." He asks that the British Government consent to having "further regulation" made during "the coming season," to the end that "the valuable herd may be saved from total extermination." (P. 53, No. 34.)

This letter is the "negotiation" which Mr. Olney considers ample warrant for his asking Senator FRYE to drop the Dingley seal bill, H. R. 9026, then before the Senate, being made a special order for March 16, 1896, and this letter is answered, after it has been carefully studied by the Canadians, as follows:

April 17, 1896.—Lord Salisbury, British premier, answers by saying that Mr. Olney's statement that 28,000 seal pups died from starvation last year is "founded on the assumption" and not on the fact that "the death of these pups was due to the direct result of their mothers having been killed at sea," and goes into an extended analysis of the same to show Mr. Olney that he (Mr. Olney) does not know what the facts are, and denies any necessity for any change during the coming season. He, however, has no objection, and is "desirous" of conducting an "independent inquiry" into the "state of the herd" by an "agent sent from this country," etc. (P. 57-58, No. 38.)

Sir Julian hands this to Mr. Olney April 29, who swallows the rejection of his argument without comment, and hastens to knuckle down in the following submissive note—of which the extract below only is made:

April 29, 1896.—Richard Olney informs Sir Julian that he accepts Lord Salisbury's amendment to his (Olney's) letter of the "11th ultimo," and ventures "to suggest" that the British agent stop over here on his way to Alaska and see the "expert," Mr. Hamlin; "the objects of his mission would probably be greatly promoted." (P. 62, No. 43.)

Lord Salisbury then proceeds to fix the status of the British investigation agent (and that of course fixes the powers of Olney's), that no negotiations will be reopened pending the receipt of his report, and closes the door on Olney for that issue during the coming season.

May 14, 1896.—Lord Salisbury informs Mr. Bayard that, "pending the receipt of the report which the agent will be instructed to furnish, Her Majesty's Government will not be in a position to enter upon negotiations." (P. 63, No. 46.)

After sleeping on this defeat, Mr. Olney finally plucks up courage enough to try and get a change in the "firearm" regulations, as to sealing them up, etc. He stirs up Lord Salisbury, as follows:

July 2, 1896.—Richard Olney sends a copy of a letter of Charles S. Hamlin, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, in which he asks that the British Government's consent to a change in the existing firearm regulations be made, itemizing the same. Mr. Olney asks that "Her Majesty's Government agree to the foregoing suggestions," etc. (P. 74, No. 56.)

In order to give Mr. Olney's wounds time to heal before knocking him out again, Lord Salisbury waits until the 7th of August before administering the second "turn down," viz:

August 7, 1896.—Viscount Gough (acting for Sir Julian) addresses Mr. Rockhill (who is acting for Mr. Olney), saying that with regard to certain amendments to the existing regulations suggested by Mr. Hamlin, "Her Majesty's Government regrets that they can not enter into the supplementary arrangements in regard to sealers entering Bering Sea suggested by Mr. Hamlin." (P. 79, No. 63.)

The amiable Mr. Hamlin, not relishing this cool turn-down, manages to inspire the crestfallen Mr. Olney with a supply of fresh courage enough to drive out the following letter, in which he is bound to have something in the nature of an offer made by him accepted by Salisbury, so he sends the following "clever" note:

October 13, 1896.—Mr. Olney writes to Viscount Gough, saying that the detailed reply to his (Olney's) note of 2d July last has caused Mr. Hamlin to address him a letter on the 3d instant, in which Mr. Hamlin "calls attention to the somewhat surprising statement" contained in Viscount Gough's communication, etc., but that "in view of the fact that the sealing season is now finished," etc., he "would suggest that the whole question be postponed pending the receipt of Jordan's report," etc. (P. 82, No. 66.)

Olney was gratified this time, for the British premier promptly agreed to the postponement. But he rubbed a little salt into that agreement, however, for he coupled it with a note of warning for Mr. Olney, as follows:

November 14, 1896.—Lord Salisbury informs Sir Julian that "Her Majesty's Government agree to postpone further discussion into a revision of the firearm regulations, "but in view of the concluding paragraph of Mr. Olney's letter of the 13th ultimo, your excellency should be careful to avoid any expression which might be construed into an admission that Her Majesty's Government contemplate a revision of the regulations before the period named by the Arbitration Tribunal has expired." (P. 83, No. 67.)

After sleeping a month over this understanding with Lord Salisbury, Olney, through the pressure of the amiable Mr. Hamlin, seems to think the limit of this proposed postponement has been reached, and he thinks the question ought to be now taken up without delay; so—

December 15, 1896.—Mr. Olney informs Sir Julian that he wishes now to "reopen the question" and have "it settled before the sealing season of 1897 opens," etc. (P. 83, No. 68.)

Lord Salisbury, after wondering over the persistency of Mr. Olney in putting his [Olney's] head into a poke, finally punches it again, deliberately and slowly, thus:

January 14, 1897.—Lord Salisbury asks Sir Julian to "inform the United States Government," and "explain to them" that "the Canadians must act in the premises first," and "until they do act," he will do nothing, etc. (No. 69, p. 85.)

Mr. Olney braces up again, and ventures to inquire as to what the Canadians are likely to do (which of course Lord Salisbury has not the least idea of, no more than Olney).

January 23, 1897.—Mr. Onley asks Sir Julian "when the Canadian government will probably be prepared to take action in regard to the question," etc. (P. 86, No. 70.)

On the 9th March Lord Salisbury informs Sir Julian (p. 87, No. 72) that he is "still in correspondence with the Canadians" over this question, and a further communication will be made, etc., over these points; and that ends it forever, in so far as Mr. Richard Olney goes.

The foregoing record of complete failure following the request made in March, 1896, that the Dingley seal bill be dropped, is fastened on Mr. Richard Olney in the most complete and enduring manner and form by the official records quoted above.

The next chapter in this wretched record of our official inability to meet the Canadians successfully with a good cause in our hands is furnished by the record of the John W. Foster management of the business, and that appears in the following sequence, bearing in mind all the time that Messrs. Hamlin and Jordan are in constant accord and full understanding with the Hon. John W. Foster.

MR. JOHN W. FOSTER—HIS RECORD OF BOTCH WORK.

The State Department letters quoted under this head are signed by John Sherman, Secretary, but it is admitted in that Department that they were all prepared by John W. Foster and Charles

S. Hamlin. Those who were acquainted with the physical condition of Mr. Sherman can easily explain why it was done.

March 6, 1897.—Lord Salisbury asks Sir Julian to inform the United States Government that he has received a copy of Dr. Jordan's report for 1896, but that up to date he has not received a copy of Dr. Thompson's report, but that it will be forwarded just as soon as he gets it. He says that Dr. Jordan's report does not present any facts that warrant the statement of an "early extermination" of the seal herd, and that Thompson has the same opinion. He will not agree to any change in the regulations for the coming season of 1897, and wants Thompson to go up again this year, etc. (P. 86, No. 71.)

March 12, 1897.—John Sherman asks Sir Julian as to "when the Canadian government would take action in regard to the inspection of seal skins;" it is so urgent, and it ought to be attended to at once, etc. (P. 88, No. 73.)

Thompson's report not being at hand, and Jordan telling Foster that it contains a "perfect agreement" with himself on all "vital" points, the Hon. John W. Foster importunes Sir Julian for a copy of it or advance sheets, being quite certain in his mind that the British Government are afraid to have its conclusions published. In order, therefore, to let Foster have a clear understanding of what Thompson really did conclude, Sir Julian informs Foster of the truth.

March 23, 1897.—Sir Julian informs Mr. Sherman that "Professor Thompson has stated to Her Majesty's Government his views as to the various points in regard to seal life, which require further investigation to enable Her Majesty's Government to consider the question of revising the regulations," but from his information "there is apparently no reason for any fear of danger to the herd at the present time," etc. (P. 89, No. 74.)

This kind of staggers the belief of the Hon. Mr. Foster, but he still suspects a "nigger" in the Salisbury wood pile, and he employs the following "diplomatic" stroke over Sir Julian's head to smoke him out.

April 10, 1897, London.—Mr. White (embassy of the United States) addresses Lord Salisbury that "as a result of the investigations made last year in Alaskan waters by Dr. Jordan, with whose views Professor Thompson, who was sent by Her Majesty's Government to make similar investigations, is believed to concur," has forced the President to believe that the seals are on the verge of "early extinction," and that it is a matter of grave concern to him (the President), etc. He asks that the modus vivendi of 1891 be taken up and put into force for the coming season, and he says that if this modus is taken up at once and agreed to, Thompson can visit the seal islands again(!). He wants a reply at "the earliest date which may be practicable." (P. 89, No. 75.)

This implication, coarse as it was and thinly veiled, that Lord Salisbury was suppressing the points in Thompson's report, was just the fool document needed to put that gentleman on his mettle and to destroy all further chances, if any ever existed, for the Hon. John W. Foster to use his "diplomacy" in behalf of the seals. In the meantime Lord Salisbury had received the following from Sir Julian, which clearly disclosed the "Hon. John W. Foster's" hand in the preparation of the White note, quoted above:

April 11, 1897.—Sir Julian informs Lord Salisbury that "the Hon. John W. Foster, who was United States agent at the Paris arbitration, has been nominated by the President a commissioner to carry on the negotiations and conduct the correspondence on the subject on behalf of the United States Government." (P. 90, No. 77.)

Foster was formally appointed on the 9th of April, but was actually at it from the beginning of McKinley's Administration, March 4, 1897. Lord Salisbury was, of course, privately well informed as to the authorship of the seal letters and propositions which officially came to him signed by "John Sherman" and the "President." He knew the lightness of the Foster caliber, and undoubtedly chuckled over the rapid succession of confused, inaccurate, and impertinent statement and suggestion which came from this time on to him from our State Department as to the fur seals.

On the 9th of April, 1897, Mr. Foster led off with the following proposition made to Sir Julian through John Sherman—the original suggestion of the scheme came from Mr. Hamlin, who was urging Judge Gresham, then Secretary of State, to press it during the winter of 1895:

April 9, 1897.—Sir Julian writes saying that this day Mr. Sherman wants him "to sound the British Government" as to desirability of settling the seal question by an international agreement between "the United States, Great Britian, Russia, Japan, and Hawaii to prohibit absolutely the killing of fur seals both on land and at sea for such a period as might be found necessary for the herds to regain their normal numbers," etc. (P. 9, No. 78.)

While Sir Julian was sending this proposition, verbally made to him on that day by John Sherman, Mr. Foster had prepared and forwarded the following letter, which was brought out by the plump denial of any immediate danger to the seal herd, based upon Jordan and Thompson's reports, by Lord Salisbury, quoted above, under date of "March 23, 1897" (P. 89, No. 74):

It will be observed that it is the prelude to the White note, quoted above, and coarsely insinuates that the British Government is suppressing Thompson's report for a purpose. It then goes into a discussion of statistics and facts which are simply confused, unfortunate, and erroneous in application, and winds up with the broad hint that the British Government does not, perhaps, mean to act in good faith. As a forerunner of the notorious "shirt sleeve" letter of the 10th of May following, it is interesting as a study of the antecedents of the most senseless and mischievous letter, of American authorship, that ever went into the official files of the State Department.

April 9, 1897.—John Sherman addresses Sir Julian with a long letter devoted to an attempt to show why Lord Salisbury is in error with regard to the conclusion of Julian's report; that the President is "greatly concerned;" that it is "unfortunate for this Government that it does not possess Thompson's report," and winds up with an urgent request that a modus vivendi be agreed upon at once for 1897, etc. (p. 92, No. 79).

The White note and this one just quoted bring out from Lord Salisbury the following non sequitur, denying, paragraph by paragraph, the erroneous statements contained in them, and carefully omitting to answer the correct charges; it also denies the modus vivendi, and really closes the subject for the current year; it also sends Thompson's report for 1896, and denies any agreement in it with Jordan's "facts."

April 22, 1897.—The British premier informs Sir Julian that the demand for the modus vivendi and the claim of extreme urgency is "reputed to be based on the result of Dr. Jordan's investigations last year, in which it is stated that Professor Thompson is believed to concur. I am unable to inclose for communication to the United States Government copies of Mr. Thompson's report, from which it will be seen that the President is mistaken in supposing that, in the opinion of the British agent, there is any immediate cause for alarm. * * * Dr. Jordan's report has been carefully examined, and it does not appear to contain any facts" which would warrant the statement made in Mr. White's note as to the "depleted condition and prospective early extinction of the herd.

"If the United States Government is prepared to give adequate compensation to the sealing fleet on account of its enforced abstention from the fishery this season, Her Majesty's Government would have no reason for refusing their assent to a modus vivendi, but they do not gather that such is the case, and it would be impossible for them to submit a vote to Parliament for the purpose, holding as they do, that no sufficient reason has been shown for its necessity."

As regards the proposed conference, Her Majesty's Government are of the opinion that "further investigation is necessary" on "many points connected with seal life before the questions at issue could be discussed with the hope of obtaining any satisfactory result. * * * And Her Majesty's Government must adhere to the view set forth in my dispatch of the 6th ultimo, that further investigation is required before the question of revising the regulations can be considered," etc. (p. 95, No. 82).

The following letter from Lord Salisbury is a categorical denial of John Sherman's long letter of April 9, quoted above. It goes into detailed analysis of the confused and blundering statements and figures used by Messrs. Foster and Hamlin in that letter, and, in short, makes our complaint appear to be positively silly as it is put out by Foster.

May 7, 1897.—Lord Salisbury to Sir Julian; proceeds to pick to pieces the incoherent items of John Sherman's letter of the 9th ultimo, and literally riddles it; it is interesting to note the contents of this letter, which were on the way over the ocean at the very time the notorious "shirt-sleeve" letter was prepared and sent by Foster and Hamlin; had these authors of that boomerang been aware of the text of this letter at that time, the "shirt-sleeve" letter would never have been written and posted, but it was composed and finished and mailed May 10, and in the hands of John Hay at about the same time that this letter of Salisbury got into our State Department. These letters passed each other, going and coming, on the ocean. (P. 99, No. 90.)

The following letter, the "shirt-sleeve" letter, was written by John W. Foster and Charles S. Hamlin. It is the attempt of those two men who got into water far beyond their depth, and it is the letter that made an end to all further successful attempts by the McKinley Administration to alter or amend the shameful order of affairs on the seal islands. It is a very long letter, filled with a perfect medley of truth and error in statement, and of silly opinion and inference. It covers nearly nine pages of the British Blue Book.

The most amazing circumstance about the whole affair is that the President, when this letter was read to him, did not stop it and alter its coarse tone and senseless insinuation of Great Britain's want of common honesty and good faith. The authors of the letter were very proud at the time of this rambling, self-contradicting, and mischievous screed, but it is said that Ambassador Hay, when he first received it, was struck with these faults just mentioned and tried to have it withdrawn, or greatly modified, but that he was peremptorily directed to deliver it to Lord Salisbury. He did so on May 22, having held it up nearly a week.

May 10, 1897.—John Sherman writes to Mr. Hay a long letter expressing his regret that the British Government has rejected the modus vivendi, and the joint conference of expert agents of the powers he suggests for 1897. He says that it is "surprising that Her Majesty's secretary should base his rejection of the proposals of this Government, so impressively submitted, upon the report of one scientist whose facts and conclusions are incorrectly apprehended, and the delayed report of another, which is for the first time made public," etc. * * * (P. 104-111, No. 94.)

To this ill-advised and inaccurate letter, long and tedious, Lord Salisbury never made any reply. He gave it the quietus of silence, and at the same time turned his back on any further advances from the same source—from John W. Foster and his associates. Then and there ended any and all successful effort for any revision or betterment of the conditions on the seal islands while John W. Foster had anything to do with it in so far as Her Majesty's Government was concerned.

But on page 120 (No. 105) of this Blue Book, quoted, appears a ten-page letter signed by "Edward Wingfield," dated "Downing street, July 26, 1897," and addressed—"Colonial Office to Foreign Office"—"Received July 26, 1897," in which the "shirt-sleeve" letter is literally eviscerated and dissected, and ripped to nothing but shreds; unquestionably the data was furnished by the Canadian managers, but the blundering statements of fact, the coarse insinuations, and the shallow "regrets" of Mr. Foster are turned inside out by this clerk in Mr. Chamberlain's office.

In order to break the force of the utter, complete collapse of the case of the United States in this business, Mr. Hay, by virtue of his personal worth and entire innocence of any association with the authorship of the "shirt-sleeve" letter, was able to get the thoroughly disgusted British prime minister to agree to an informal meeting of Jordan and Thompson, as experts, at Washington, and nothing else, with no power to revise things, viz:

July 28, 1897.—Lord Salisbury addresses Mr. Hay, saying:

"In the last paragraph of the dispatch, addressed to you by Mr. Sherman, under the date of the 10th May last, and communicated by you to me on the 22d of that month, a wish is expressed for a conference of the powers interested in the fur-seal fishery of the North Pacific.

"In reply I have to state that Her Majesty's Government are willing to agree to a meeting of experts nominated by Great Britain and Canada, and by the United States, in October next." * * * (P. 130, No. 106.)

The above succinct and direct citations from the official record show exactly what our agents did to botch and wreck our case, after holding up the Dingley seal bill in 1896, down to the final extinction of it by that "joint statement," signed in the State Department; the progress of that particular work began and ended as outlined in the following record, also taken from the British Blue Book and the Report of Dr. David Starr Jordan, February 24, 1898.

THE GENESIS OF THE "JOINT STATEMENT OF CONCLUSIONS," ETC., SIGNED BY THE AGENTS OF THE UNITED STATES WITH THOSE OF GREAT BRITAIN NOVEMBER 16, 1897.

April 9, 1897.—John W. Foster is appointed by the President as a "special commissioner," to negotiate with Great Britain for a revision of the costly and useless regulations of the Bering Sea tribunal. Jordan has impressed the Administration with the belief that he has secured a perfect agreement with the British agents for the suppression of pelagic sealing. To be sure of this, however, a "diplomatic agent," "astute" and "brilliant," is needed to manage the landing of this agreement; so Foster is selected!

May 10, 1897.—After receiving the official refusal of the British Government, dated April 22, to reopen the sealing question, John W. Foster and Charles S. Hamlin prepare and send to Ambassador Hay, for Lord Salisbury, the notorious "shirt-sleeve" letter. Mr. Hay had sense enough to try and suppress it, but the Administration, at that moment, thought it a fine state paper, and overruled Mr. Hay. It was given to the British Government May 22, 1897, but Mr. Hay succeeded in so warning the Administration as to its effect if made public that the Associated Press copies of it, which had been sent out, were held up until the 14th of July, 1897, when it was suddenly published in the New York Tribune, and in that paper alone, and contrary to orders.

This publication of that rank diplomatic work of John W. Foster aroused so much contempt and indignation in England that the door of Lord Salisbury's office was promptly and silently closed to Mr. Foster. The British premier caused it to be officially published that he refused to have any official intercourse with Mr. Foster, even though that person was in London at the time (July), and that Mr. Hay was the only one who could address him.

Thus it will be observed that at the very outset of this business of arranging for the Jordan-Thompson seal conference Mr. Foster, by his want of sense and total inability to manage it, has destroyed any chance for a successful outcome of its meeting in so far as the British Government was concerned, and the fact is as plain as a pikestaff.

In spite of this proof of his incompetency and dead failure, this man, the Hon. John W. Foster, in order to keep up appearances and have some reason for his official being as a "special envoy," etc., posts directly from the closed door at Salisbury's office to St. Petersburg, and there actually invites the Russian Government to send delegates to attend a joint conference of English, Japanese, and American experts with power to revise the rules and regulations of the Bering Sea tribunal!

And he went still further as a "diplomat" and "special envoy," etc., for he caused it to be published (August 1) in the press dispatches of this country that these delegates would all assemble at Washington in October, with full powers to revise the Bering Sea regulations if they saw fit to do so.

This publication aroused the Canadian government, and it promptly issued, through Lord Salisbury, a vigorous denial of any participation by Great Britain in such a conference.

Nevertheless the Hon. Charles Sumner Hamlin is posted over to Tokyo as another special envoy to invite the Japanese Government to send delegates to this forbidden feast.

The net result of this stupid officialism was an indignant and disgusted meeting of Japs and Russians at the State Department, about the middle of October.

Of course what they did amounted to nothing, and they knew it; they were buncoed and steered into an absurd dress parade at Washington.

In the meantime, to break the force of this fur-seal fiasco as managed by John W. Foster, Mr. Hay, who was our ambassador at London, prevailed upon Lord Salisbury so that the British agents, Thompson and Macoun, were permitted to meet our agents, Jordan and Hamlin, "informally," that they might talk over the subject all they desired to, but that no powers whatever were vested in them beyond that.

Dr. Jordan ought to have seen by this time that he had not succeeded in getting this "perfect agreement" with the British agents, and that he was done for, boxed up, and laid away. But his fatuous soul persisted, and in order that no further disturbance f rom his quarter should ever manifest itself, the Canadians took him up on his "perfect agreement" and secured one in the conference, November 16, 1897, which exactly suited them and nonsuited our case.

Mr. Speaker, this exhibition of Mr. Olney's failure to handle the Canadians was swiftly followed, as you have seen, by the mischievous and incompetent work of John W. Foster, who was for some inscrutable reason—by reason of some accident—taken up to right this utter collapse of Mr. Olney's plans.

It should be plainly stated to the House that this is the same John W. Foster who so mismanaged our case at Paris, 1891–1893, that we were shamefully humiliated and overwhelmingly defeated on each and every count submitted by us to the tribunal of arbitration.

He now comes onto the scene again, with a fresh lease of life for his ignorance and incompetence; he proceeds to live right up to his record, and at once begins in the following fashion:

EXHIBIT D.

Showing the progress of the international "seal conferences," at Washington, in which agents of Russia, Great Britain, Japan, and the United States took part, as given to the public by our agents in the State Department, down to the date of the dissolution and failure of these conferences, November 16, 1897, closed by the following declaration of the Canadian Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in which he tells the truth, and boasts of the triumph of his agents:

TORONTO, November 27.

Sir Louis H. Davies, at a meeting of Liberals here last night, referred to his recent visit to Washington to attend the seal conference. He said:

"The seal experts settled the question of fact in such a way that hereafter it can not be opened up. We know exactly where we are." (General press dispatch, Cleveland Plain Dealer, Nov. 28, 1897.)

After the British Government had officially refused to enter into a modus vivendi for 1897 and to take any part in a joint conference with agents of Russia, Japan, and our Government, under date of April 22, 1897 (British Blue Book, U. S. No. 4 (1897), No. 82, p. 95), the Hon. John W. Foster, who was appointed April 9, 1897, to manage this business, again comes forward and again gives proof of his unfitness to handle the subject. He actually goes in person to St. Petersburg during July following the date of the refusal of Lord Salisbury quoted above and invites the Russian Government to send delegates to this forbidden conference, and the same improper invitation is given to the Japanese Government in person at Tokyo by "Special Envoy" Charles S. Hamlin.

The Russian delegates arrived in Washington on the 12th of October, 1897; they were followed by the Japanese delegates on the 18th of that month. they were naturally much chagrined and stirred when they learned the truth as to the part they were taking in a farce. Mr. Foster had to do something at once to quiet them, so he and his associates gave out the following stuff and nonsense to the press:

TO PROTECT SEAL HERDS—RUSSIA'S STRINGENT REGULATIONS ON THE SUBJECT—ZONE LIMIT OF 30 MILES—ONLY RUSSIAN CITIZENS PERMITTED TO OPERATE WITHIN ZONE AND TO KILL NO SEALS EXCEPT THE BACHELOR, WHEN FOUND ON LAND—PUNISHMENT FOR FOREIGN POACHERS—ADVANCED ATTITUDE IN COMING CONFERENCE.

Although formal conferences on the Bering Sea question will not open until after the arrival of the Japanese delegates, yet the presence here of two of the Russian delegates has permitted the authorities to inform themselves quite thoroughly as to the attitude of Russia on the protection of the seals. It has brought out the fact that Russia takes an advanced position in preserving her seal herds, and has more stringent laws and regulations in that direction than any of the countries interested. Under the Russian system a zone 30 miles wide is established around seal islands belonging to the Empire. The seals found within this zone are regarded as exclusively Russian, and no other than the inhabitants of the islands can take a seal within these limits. This gives the Russian citizens exclusive rights over the seals, not only on the islands, but extending 30 miles seaward.

A British or Japanese sealer can not operate within the zone, except to buy skins of the Russian inhabitants of the islands. The Russians themselves are permitted to kill only bachelor seals, it being against strict regulations to kill a female or a pup seal. The females are guarded with special care, as the killing of one female is regarded as equivalent to the killing of three seals, namely, the female herself, her pup on land, and her unborn pup. Furthermore, the Russians are allowed to kill a bachelor only when the animal is on land, it being forbidden to kill any manner of seal in the water.

The Russian authorities see that these regulations are enforced. A fleet of Government ships patrol the 30-mile zone, and any foreign sealer who attempts to operate within these limits is seized. As a rule, the seized sealers are taken to Vladivostock, their catch confiscated, and severe punishment inflicted. This has led to many protests, but Russia has maintained thus far her rigid regulations against foreigners within the 30-mile zone.

In one notable case the ship Dahlia, cleared by a United States consular officer, but manned with a Japanese crew, attempted to take seals on the Russian islands. They were met with armed resistance and several of the Japanese were killed. Claims for indemnity were made against Russia, but never paid, as the Imperial authorities maintained their right to protect their property against invasion.

It is understood to be the wish of Russia in the forthcoming conference not to stop at the protective regulations already made, but to carry them further by increasing the width of the zone considerably beyond 30 miles. The Russian authorities have found by experience that many of the female seals go more than 30 miles to sea in search of food. The wish is, therefore, to make the zone so wide that it will extend to the farthest point to which females go for food. (Post, Washington, October 15, 1897.)

This absolute nonsense, gravely and solemnly drawled out here as the "advanced position of Russia" in "preserving her seal herds," sounds precisely like that "muffled oaf" argument made by the Hon. John W. Foster at Paris in 1893, as the agent of the United States, the "brilliancy" and the "astuteness" of which cost us the most humiliating and shameful defeat that the record of American diplomacy discloses up to date—a record which makes Americans groan and excites mirth in Canada.

The Japs took the bait in good faith, and with the best intentions; they sent their delegates with Mr. Hamlin, who came back on the same ship with them. On their way over to Washington from San Francisco they heard, for the first time, that Great Britain had refused to meet them in conference. They were interviewed at Chicago, and their surprise and chagrin were very frankly expressed? We do not hear a word, however, from the Hon. Charles Sumner Hamlin, who gets them into this fiasco, which the Japs scent, but too late to "save their faces."

S. Fujita, director of agriculture in Japan, and Prof. K. Mitsukuri, presiding professor of zoology in the imperial university at Tokyo, arrived in the city this morning on their way as delegates from the Japanese Government to the seal-fisheries conference in Washington, November 12.

They were accompanied from Japan by Hon. Charles S. Hamlin, special commissioner of the United States, who bore the invitation for Japan to participate in the conference.

From San Francisco they were accompanied as far as Council Bluffs by Dr. David Starr Jordan, of Leland Stanford Junior University, who is also a delegate and will join them later in Washington.

Referring to the refusal of Great Britain to send delegates to the conference, Mr. Fujita said: "At the time of our leaving Japan we understood the United States, Great Britain, and Russia had agreed to act with us.

"The fact that Great Britain had refused was not known to us till our arrival in San Francisco.

"We are now awaiting instructions from our Government as to whether or not we shall participate in the conference. We hope to receive them in a few days at Washington." (Chicago Journal, October 15, 1897.)

In the meantime Dr. Jordan, who had joined them as a brother delegate at San Francisco, stops off en route and runs up to Minneapolis, Minn., where he interviews very freely; but considering the fact that he knows his Slavonian and Mongolian associates are going to be buncoed soon, he, oddly enough, says nothing about it.

"ARE BOTH TO BLAME—UNCLE SAM AND JOHN BULL HAVE KILLED THE SEALS.

"Dr. David Starr Jordan, president of Stanford University, California, and United States commissioner in the fur-seal investigations, is the guest of his brother-in-law, Edward J. Edwards, of 500 Eighth street S. Dr. Jordan is on his way to attend the international conference concerning the fur seals, and is accompanied by G. A. Clark, a graduate of the University of Minnesota, class of 1891, who acted as his secretary during the investigation.

In speaking of the frightful destruction of seals, Dr. Jordan said:

"The breeding females are the life of the herd, as only 1 male in 30 is allowed to enter it, and males have always existed in great superabundance. Since 1885 the American herd has fallen from 600,000 breeding females to 130,000; the Russian herd from 300,000 to about 50,000; the Kurile herd from about 40,000 to 1,200—that part of it now belonging to Japan now numbering 20 females as against 25,000 formerly. The Mexican herd (Guadaloupe Island), once numbering about 10,000, is now extinct. The sole cause of decline has been in all cases the same—the indiscriminate killing of females. For this great international crime two nations are solely responsible. They are Great Britain and the United States.

"One great obstacle to the success of negotiations in the past is the fact that we have never come into any conference with clean hands. American hands have destroyed one-third of our own herd, which once had a cash value of $25,000,000, and more than half the devastation of other herds has been due to American enterprise. We have allowed our pirates to destroy the seal herds of ourselves and our neighbors just as we allow squatters to burn off our forests to improve the feed for their sheep.

English they be and Japanese
That hank on the Brown Bear's flank;
And some be Scot, but the worst God wot
And the boldest thieves be Yank.

"If nations were as honest and as just in their dealings as private citizens are forced to be, the whole seal controversy could be settled in a day. And it must be settled." (Minneapolis Times, Oct. 17, 1897.)

This improvised and elegant verse of Dr. Jordan, in which the weakness of the Yankee is so feelingly expressed, is quite Fosterian in its fitness as a diplomatic prelude by our agents to a joint conference. Jordan is learning rapidly under this "astute" diplomat's guidance.

The Japs get into Washington October 18, and, being in a state of mind as to what they ought to do under the changed order of their understanding, they were steered up to the author of their embarrassment in the State Department, October 19—to Hon. John W. Foster. What that distinguished "diplomat" said to these oriental "experts" is not known, but it appears that the President sent for this "diplomat" early in the afternoon following the arrival of the Japs at the State Department. What Mr. Foster said as to his part in this fiasco is also not known; the reporters, who care for these little affairs to the best of their ability, however, secured and published the following:

TRICKED INTO IT BY SHERMAN—SIR LATONI SAYS JAPAN IS IN THE SEALING CONFERENCE ONLY OUT OF COURTESY.

OTTAWA, CANADA, November 1.

Sir Ernest Latoni, British minister to Japan, is in Montreal.

He says Japan is in the sealing conference only out of courtesy, having been misled by Sherman as to the facts. (Chicago Journal, November 1, 1897.)

The Japanese delegates to the tripartite conference on seal life, who arrived in Washington yesterday, called at the State Department to-day and were presented to ex-Secretary Foster, who has in charge the negotiations for the conference, by one of the secretaries of the Japanese legation. Mr. Botkine, of the Russian delegation, called at the Department to talk over the arrangements for the conference with General Foster. It is understood that they expect to make a short visit to New York this week, but will return on Friday in time to attend the first meeting of the conference on Saturday, October 23. The President had a conference with John W. Foster this afternoon, presumably to learn the status of the seal conference matter. (Chicago Inter-Ocean, October 19, 1897.)

On the 23d October, 1897, the Japanese and Russian delegates met in secret conference at the State Department, and by November 1, 1897, they came to a complete agreement—"if Great Britain would agree with them," etc.; their agreement was signed, and their treaty signed subject to that condition. This aimless, useless documeut now sleeps in the pigeonholes of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, a sleep that will have no waking.

This solemn farce being concluded, the Hon. John W. Foster turned his powers of "skilled diplomacy" loose upon the coy and backward British delegates, and he actually sought to trap these wary birds by sprinkling banquet salt upon their tails in the following "brilliant" effort:

DINNER TO SEAL CONFEREES—A DISTINGUISHED GATHERING AT HON. JOHN W. FOSTER'S HOME—SCIENTISTS, DIPLOMATS, OFFICIALS, AND PROMINENT CITIZENS OF WASHINGTON MEET AT THE HOSPITABLE BOARD OF THE EX-SECRETARY.

Ex-Secretary of State John W. Foster last night gave a dinner to his associates of the international fur-seal conference, which is now in session in this city. It was a brilliant affair, and was perhaps the most distinguished gathering of scientists and public men ever assembled at a private entertainment. Mrs. Foster, assisted by Mrs. Pierre Botkine, the wife of the Russian delegate to the conference, received the guests in the magnificent music room, which was handsomely decorated with chrysanthemums and other cut flowers. The table was a mass of roses.

The guests of honor were Prof. David S. Jordan, Charles S. Hamlin, Japanese Delegates Shiro Fujita and Prof. Kakichi Mitsukuri, and the Russian delegates, M. de Wollant, Pierre Botkine, and M. de Routkowsky. Owing to the nearness of the election, many who had received invitations to attend were unable to do so, as they had left for their respective homes. (Post, Washington, D. C., November 2, 1897.)

It certainly was a "brilliant affair," and possibly the "most distinguished gathering of scientists and public men ever assembled at a private entertainment," as the long list of victims who attended amply attest, and who were received in the "magnificent music room," and who were fed on a table that "was a mass of roses!"

It also is noted in this list of guests present that while "the distinguished British scientist, Professor Thompson," was in evidence bodily, Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British ambassador, was shut out from this delightful entertainment "owing to the recent death of the Duchess of Teck." [Ahem! Did Sir Julian ask the Hon. John W. Foster to thus publicly give reason for not being present at this "brilliant affair," and if so, why is there no explanation of the fact that Canadians, too, are all missing from the roster of this rare diplomatic function?]

After the Russians and the Japs were out of sight and completely eliminated from the question Lord Salisbury allows the "informal meeting" of Jordan and Hamlin with his agents, Professor Thompson and Mr. James Macoun. The time and manner of the opening and procedure of this second international farce in the "seal conference" was given to the press by Mr. Foster and his associates, as follows:

EXPERTS IN SESSION.

Ex-Secretary Foster called on the premier early in the day, and later Sir Wilfred Laurier and Sir Louis Davies called on the British ambassador, Sir Julian Pauncefote, who accompanied them in a call on Secretary Sherman. Dr. Jordan, the United States seal expert, called on Professor Thompson, the British expert, and Professor Macoun, the expert of Canada, and it was arranged to have the meeting of experts at the State Department at 2 o'clock this afternoon, to consider the seal question.

CONFERENCE OF EXPERTS.

An understanding was reached that the experts should conduct the meeting, but that the distinguished gentlemen present would be free to ask questions and exchange views incidental to the exchange of expert testimony. This gives the meeting the more important aspect of a conference among diplomatic officials, although nominally Lord Salisbury's original condition that it was to be only a "meeting of experts" is being rigidly adhered to in all the formalities of the gathering.

State Department officials, as well as those of Canada, say that no definite line of settlement has yet presented itself and that the character of the settlement will depend upon the exchange of views between the experts. Much doubt prevails as to how far the treaty concluded Saturday between the United States, Russia, and Japan relative to the suspension of sealing will have a bearing on the matter. Up to the time the meeting opened neither the Britith nor the Canadians had been officially advised of the existence of the Russo-Japanese treaty.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier and party arrived here yesterday afternoon and took quarters at the Shoreham. The members of the party are: Sir Wilfrid and Lady Laurier, Sir Louis and Lady Davies, Miss Ethel Davies, Prof. J. M. Maccoun, Mr. R. M. Venning, Mr. R. Boudreau, and Mr. E. B. Williams.

RECEIVED BY THE PRESIDENT.

President McKinley to-day received Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the blue room at the White House. Secretary Sherman introduced Sir Wilfrid, who was accompanied by Sir Julian Pauncefote, British ambassador, Sir Louis Davies, and Professor Thompson, the British seal expert. The visit was entirely formal.

OPENING THE CONFERENCE.

The conference began at the State Department at 2.30 o'clock this afternoon. The meeting was held in the diplomatic anteroom, which a few days ago was the scene of a similar gathering of representatives of Russia, Japan, and the United States.

A treaty for the suspension of pelagic sealing was the result of the Russian-Japanese-United States conference, and the hope is expressed that similar action will be taken by the conference which began its sessions to-day.

It was made clear at the State Department that to-day's meeting was "a conference of experts," and that no other officials would take active part. The conferees are Mr. Hamlin and Professor Jordan on behalf of the United States, Prof. D'Arcy Thompson for England, and Professor Macoun for Canada. Two delegates are allowed the United States, in order to offset the apparent advantage of probable joint action on the part of the delegates from England and Canada.

All the delegates have spent many months in Bering Sea and vicinity investigating seal life and are thoroughly equipped for the work in hand.

The main purpose of their investigations was to determine the effect of pelagic sealing on the life of the herd. The individual reports of the experts will be considered at the present conference, with a view to reaching an agreement as to the best course of action for the protection and preservation of the seal herds. In case the American and foreign experts agree that pelagic sealing threatens the extermination of the seals, there is no doubt of a satisfactory arrangement between Great Britain and the United States on the sealing question.

There is reason to believe, however, that the English and Canadian experts do not altogether agree with the American experts as to the disastrous effects of pelagic sealing.

To-day's session was devoted mainly to organization and an agreement as to the course of procedure. Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British ambassador; Sir Wilfred Laurier, the Canadian premier; Sir Louis Davies, the Canadian minister of marine, accompanied the English and Canadian experts to the conference, and were present only as spectators, taking no part in the proceedings. Ex-Secretary Foster was present in the same capacity on the part of the United States. (Washington Evening Star, November 10, 1897.)

The carefully prepared introduction to an entirely fruitless conference, a sham battle, contains the carefully suppressed truth as to the barren result of the Japanese-Russo meeting of "experts" a few days earlier. It will be noted that the first hint of the failure of Jordan's "perfect agreement" with his British associate as to details of pelagic sealing is given out, covertly, in this statement.

The sessions of this conference, like those of the Russo-Japanese conferences, continued behind closed doors for six days, and until the Canadians had succeeded in getting Dr. Jordan to sign away himself every "fact" that he had prepared for them to sign. The only glimpses the public had of these confabulations appeared furtively in dispatches like the following: The "success" of our "experts" had at last rendered the Hon. John W. Foster dumb.

If the seal experts have reached a deadlock or have completed their labors, the fact has not been officially made known by Gen. John W. Foster, who has full charge of the negotiations. (Chicago Journal, November 13, 1897.)

But the Hon. John W. Foster did let a few hints escape, as follows, which did suggest a deadlock at the outset (which in truth was the fact), and it will be observed that the wit of the Canadian simply staggered the dull wit of that gentleman, though light was dawning.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 12.

The third session of the experts on seal life was held at the State Department to-day, all of the representatives of the United States, Canada, and Great Britain being in attendance except Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who spent the morning in visiting the Catholic University. Mr. Adams, first secretary of the British embassy, took his place as the diplomatic representative of the Canadian government.

It is stated upon good authority that the Canadians will ask a counter concession from this country in the way of a guaranty for the protection of the northern fisheries in return for any alteration of the sealing regulations to which they may give their consent. They take the position that the fish along the Canadian and Newfoundland coasts are as much the property of Canada as are the seals on the Pribilof Islands the property of the United States, and contend that they have as much right to make demand for the protection of the fish against American fishermen as we have to ask Canadians to agree to further restrictions in the matter of killing the seals.

THE SPECIFIC COMPLAINT.

Their specific complaint is that while Canadian laws prohibit fishing except within certain seasons, the American laws do not impose corresponding conditions, and that while the taking of fish can be prohibited during the closed seasons within their territory, it can not be controlled outside of these boundaries. Many of the fish which properly belong within Canadian waters are thus picked up out of season by American fishermen. Sir Wilfrid Laurier will ask the United States to agree to the protection of these fish during the breeding season as an offset for any seal concession to which Canada may consent.

During to-day's conference a series of propositions was presented by the American representatives, covering the number and habits of the seals, and the extent to which the seal herd had been reduced during the five years in which the Paris award had been in operation. In turn, the British-Canadian representatives presented counter propositions, covering their view of the same subjects. (Chicago Inter Ocean, November 13, 1897.)

The mental activity of Dr. Jordan and his associate during such a slant from the "disastous effect of pelagic sealing" in this secret conference has been, unhappily, denied a record. But two days later the alert reporters pumped out a decided admission that Jordan's "agreement" with the British agents was a "flash in the pan." They got the following, all there was in the empty proceedings and resultant failure of our case:

Washington, November 15.—Canada is not disposed to accept our proposals looking to the preservation of the seal herds, and the diplomatic negotiations that opened so auspiciously and which had in view the permanent settlement of all old disputes are threatened with entire failure.

The affair will probably come to a head late this afternoon. The seal experts have agreed, and they are expected before night to submit a signed report embodying some undisputed statistics as to the decrease in seal life.

The agreement is on technical matters only, and has no effect except to lay the foundation for the diplomatic wrangle over the real question which, in a few words, is: "Will Canada quit?"

Secretary Sherman, acting through Special Commissioner of Reciprocity John A. Kasson, is prepared to submit to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Louis Davies two propositions which, if agreed to, will open the way to negotiations for reciprocity and fix matters as desired. The proposals are:

1. An agreement to suspend pelagic sealing for one year.

2. The beginning of negotiations for the permanent suspension of pelagic sealing.

As before stated, the Canadians are not disposed to accept these conditions. They regard such acceptance as an unconditional surrender, and while professing a willingness to meet on any ground of compromise, they claim they would not be supported in such a course by public opinion at home.

The present arrangement is that the diplomatic meeting shall take place after the experts have adjourned and presented their report.

There is a possibility that at this meeting a common ground may be reached which will at least result in the appointment of a commission to conduct further negotiations.

The chances, however, do not favor this result. (Chicago Journal, November 15, 1897.)

It will be noted that the Hon. John W. Foster, in spite of the perfect collapse of this business which he has been steering, hints at the hope of being at least able to secure a continuation of his "valuable" services in the "appointment of another commission to conduct further negotiations;" and it will be also noted that the Canadians do not agree. Why should they? They have bagged the game and they have no incentive or further use for the Hon. John W. Foster.

But yet, to make sure of the seal business—to clinch the nails which they have driven for their own, holding to that "joint agreement" in conference with our experts, and which the Hon. John W. Foster managed so well for them—they put the following official quietus to the faintest hope that this man and his associates might ever again entertain of getting any agreement with them to suspend pelagic sealing.

CANADA AND THE SEALS—ENGLAND INDORSES HER ACTION IN REFUSING TO CONSENT TO A CONFERENCE.

LONDON, December 27.

Lord Salisbury, the premier, has written to United States Ambassador Hay in response to America's latest proposals in the Bering Sea controversy—her request that England would enter into an agreement with the United States, Russia, and Japan to stop sealing. Great Britain declines to enter into such an agreement. Lord Salisbury says in substance that he has communicated with the Canadian government, which has the foremost interest in the sealing question, and that Canada is unwilling to become a party to such an arrangement as is proposed by the United States. Therefore England, continues Lord Salisbury, whose interest is but slight, would not be justified in acceding to the proposals. Lord Salisbury's answer emphasizes the policy of England not to interfere in Canada's foreign relations. (Plain Dealer, Cleveland, Ohio, December 28, 1897.)

While our own people looked at the affair in this light—

"The report that the Americo-Russo-Japanese seal conference, after barely a week's session, has accepted a proposition to absolutely suspend pelagic sealing gives one the unpleasant impression that the proceedings of the conference had been 'cut and dried.' That Great Britain and Canada could be induced to assent to an arrangement of this character is not to be thought of; nor is it conceivable how the prohibition of sealing on the high seas could be enforced without the assent of the powers which would be mainly affected by the projected taboo. If the report should prove to be true, the promise that the seal conference at Washington was to be an advisory body only would have been violated, and the suspicion of the British Government that Russia and Japan had been lugged into the conference merely to outvote the British and Canadian delegations would have been justified. Great Britain would have cause for congratulation that she did not permit herself to be inveigled into a packed court by Envoy at Large Foster's 'smartness.'" (Philadelphia Record, October 31, 1897.)

THE REAL ATTITUDE OF THE CANADIANS IN THIS BUSINESS OF PELAGIC SEALING.

In this connection it is only right and manly for us to give the Canadian hunter credit for what he stands for in the prosecution of an industry which is so cruel and so infamous. If we were in his place, we would be influenced and governed by the following items of fact:

1. Pelagic fur sealing has been practiced by the natives of the northwest coast from time immemorial, and by white men more or less since 1860 up to 1886, without objection from any quarter.

2. Objection being made, and an indictment served on him in 1887–1893 by our people, he took his case into the highest court which can be created on this earth for the settlement of disputes of this kind.

3. This court, at Paris, in 1893, licensed the work which he is doing to-day, and practically set aside our complaint.

That our case at Paris was simply botched and lost by the ignorance and incompetence of our agents does not weigh a feather's weight in his mind to-day; he will not admit it; he justifies his work by that verdict of the tribunal; he does, what I am free to admit, just what an American pelagic hunter would do to-day if the tables were turned and the possession of the seal islands vested in Canada.

Therefore it is not right for us to insist upon the Canadian's lack of a virtue in this matter which we ourselves do not possess; they are in the business for all that they can make out of it, and they intend to stick to it just as long as it will pay them.

Understanding the foregoing, is it not clear to any judicial mind that the only thing for us to do in the wretched situation, as it now stands for us, is to make at once an end to a business that is not only a losing one for us, but is positively indecent every year in its sequel and will soon exterminate the fur-seal species?

We have the legal right to do this, and we have also a higher right; we have the moral right to put an end to this cruel industry; every impulse of humanity and every prompting of sound sense urges and demands of us that we do so. These motives insist that if the Canadian hunter will not let go, then that we should mercifully anticipate his work and wipe out an infamous industry which will endure indefinitely for his pecuniary gain and our sole cost and shame, unless we act accordingly.

In order, therefore, to make the best of a bad bargain it is necessary for Congress to provide the ways and means, and it will do so when the pending bill becomes a law.

It may be that when the Canadian hunter faces the ruin of his business next spring which this bill, enacted, brings to him, that he will become reasonable, and not insist upon the license which he enjoys to-day; it may be, and very likely, too, he will allow the real English sentiment to assert itself which was so well expressed by Professor Huxley in the face of our incompetent agents who urged him in 1892 to pronounce his judgment upon their papers which they submitted to him.

Since this sentiment of favor for such a measure as the pending bill comes from one who is known as possessing the greatest mind in British natural science, I take much satisfaction in quoting him. Professor Huxley says:

* * * "Finally, I venture to remark that there are only two alternative courses worth pursuing.

"One is to let the fur seals be extirpated. Mankind will not suffer much if the ladies are to do without sealskin jackets, and the fraction of the English, Canadian, and American population which lives on the sealskin industry will be no worse off than the vastly greater multitude who have had to suffer for the vagaries of fashion times out of number. Certainly, if the seals are to be a source of constant bickering between two nations, the sooner they are abolished the better.

"The other course is to tread down all merely personal and trade interests in pursuit of an arrangement that will work and be fair all around, and to sink all the stupidities of national vanity and political self-seeking along with them.

"There is a great deal too much of all these undeniable elements apparent in the documents which I have been studying.

"T. H. HUXLEY."

APRIL 25, 1892.

(Pro. Trib. Arbitration, vol. 2, Appendix I, pp. 413, 1893.)

No wonder that the foregoing caustic review of the bungling work of our agents at Paris, as well as that of the Canadian pettifoggers, caused those worthies on both sides to ignore Professor Huxley.

Just think! only think for a moment seriously, if you can, of the ridiculous reduction of this botchwork of John W. Foster in that fur-seal conference of 1897. Can anything, even in extravagant fiction, be more asinine in its conduct, or more impotent in its conclusions? Yet we have the Dr. Jordan of these idle evolutions gravely addressing a letter to the Ways and Means Committee only a few weeks ago (February 3, 1902), telling them that these seals were in no danger of extermination, and that he had left matters in fine shape, and that it was now a comparatively easy matter to stop pelagic sealing through the Joint High Commission.

Jordan is to be pitied, but not so Foster; that person, who has been the evil genius of this whole business since 1891, has a hide so thick that he does not seem to know that the Canadians have been, and are, wiping their feet upon him. Again he comes to the front as the spokesman of a "high joint commission," which it seems that the Canadians cooked up with his help in May–June, 1898. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his official family at Ottawa shrewdly counted on having Foster put at the head of such a commission. Then, having this dull person there, they would so manipulate matters as to get what they wanted more, in re a boundary of Alaska, in addition to having in hand vastly more than is right with reference to the seals, thanks to the stupidity of our agents.

Well, the Joint High Commission is launched in July, 1898, and Foster at once gives our people to understand that this sealing business, which he has bungled and marooned at Ottawa, will now be settled so as to give us our rights. It should be stated here that the membership of this Commission was made up of five members on our side and five Canadians. Senator FAIRBANKS, of Indiana, was put at the head of it and Foster at the foot, because when the President proposed to make it up after the plan of Foster a great big kick was made by several Senators who had grown weary of the sight and sound of Foster in the premises.

As soon, however, as the Commission organized Foster got to work as usual, and managed to get the State Department snarled up on the present boundary modus vivendi before John Hay could get the nuisance abated; then and at once this boundary dispute strangled the aforesaid Commission February 22, 1899. It has never had a meeting since; it never will; and it never ought to be revived.

THE HIGH JOINT COMMISSION—A NEGATION AB INITIO.

Not discouraged by the resultant failure and humiliation of this wretched seal conference, the Hon. John H. Foster, soon after its death (and his, too), again is presented to us as a member of the High Joint Commission (Canadian-American), with all of his tattered diplomacy wrapped about him. He can not, from force of habit, let the public remain in ignorance of the following bit of "official" information, and again we are told that pelagic sealing has been terminated.

EXHIBIT E.

"NO PELAGIC SEALING—AN AGREEMENT IS REACHED BY WHICH CANADA AGREES TO TERMINATE IT—LONG-STANDING DISPUTE TO BE SETTLED AT LAST.

"The Canadian negotiations recently concluded here led to the preparation of a protocol which formerly agreed to the exact subjects to be submitted to an international commission. While the protocol makes no preliminary agreement on the several questions, yet it is the general understanding among officials that the Bering Sea question will be adjusted and finally settled by the complete termination of pelagic sealing.

"This has been a source of controversy for many years, the United States seeking to put an end to pelagic sealing and Canada contesting against this termination of an industry very profitable to many citizens of the Canadian Pacific coast. During the recent negotiations, however, it developed that this industry was practically extinct and was no longer profitable to any considerable number of Canadians. It was stated by those well versed in the matter that only two Canadian vessels were engaged at present in sealing operations in Bering Sea. Heretofore the Canadian sealers have gone to Bering Sea by the hundreds, and it was impossible for Canada to stop the industry without paying these sealers a very considerable sum, running into the millions, for the extermination of their industry.

Now, however, under the changed conditions, it is said Canada has only a few sealers to deal with, and is therefore in a position to meet the contentions of the United States without seriously injuring a large established industry. While no agreement toward giving up pelagic sealing was reached during the recent meeting, the discussion was along lines indicating that the coming commission will without difficulty and with due regard for the interests of both Governments put an end to Bering Sea controversies by agreeing to a complete suspension of pelagic sealing. It is understood also that the protocol specifically recites that there shall be three representatives from each Government on the Canadian-American commission. (Cleveland Leader, June 3, 1898.)

This misleading information is continued again by the following item given to the public, in which the Jordan-Foster scheme of buying out the pelagic rights and all that rubbish is seriously mentioned:

WORK OF THE JOINT COMMISSION—WILL BE COMPLETED SOME TIME IN NOVEMBER.

QUEBEC, September 27.

The Joint Commission is making progress and will probably complete its session in November. Subcommittees are busily at work and have accomplished much. The 12 original questions in the protocol have been thoroughly canvassed, and a basis of agreement reached on most of them.

In the matter of the fur seals of Bering Sea it is probable that the American Government will purchase the ships and equipment of the Canadian sealers on condition that all Canadian rights to the seal fisheries in Bering Sea be surrendered.

Few, if any, changes will probably be made in the laws governing the fisheries of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts; in the inland fisheries it is likely that both Governments will agree to adopt uniform laws for the better protection of the fish. (General Associated Press dispatch, September 28, 1898.)

"Subcommittees are busily at work," and "have accomplished much," says the Hon. John W. Foster. Yes, they were; and their accomplishment was the act of positive negation whenever and wherever any proposition submitted to this Commission came up, either here in Washington or over there in Quebec.

As to this hint drawn out in the above dispatch about the purchase of the Canadian fleet and their rights to pelagic sealing, which was the Foster-Jordan offer, and which these agents fancied that the Canadians would agree to, the following public declaration of the Canadian minister of marine and fisheries ought to have had its effect on the obtuse wit of John W. Foster. It was rubbed into him several months earlier, but lost in the mental vacuum of that man.

TORONTO, November 27.

Sir Louis H. Davies, at a meeting of Liberals here last night, referred to his recent visit to Washington to attend the seal conference. He said:

"They were told (the Americans) that the right to catch seals being a national right, vindicated by the great Paris tribunal as a legitimate industry on the part of British subjects, could not be disposed of for mere money consideration, and that Canada did not sell national rights for money." * * * (General Associated Press dispatch, Cleveland Plain Dealer, November 28, 1897.)

Yet Mr. Foster actually again took up this positive flat refusal of the Canadians, as a member of the High Joint Commission, and fiddled away upon it during the entire period of the idle and aimless meetings of that Joint Commission, giving out at intervals the above samples of rank stuff and nonsense which ran through the columns of our newspapers over the impending "success" of its deliberations in so far as the saving of our fur-seal herd was concerned.

The untruth of these misleading dispatches, and the complete failure of the High Joint Commission to agree upon anything, except to eat, drink, and travel back and forth between Washington and Quebec, is now a subject of public record.

The late Governor Dingley, who was appointed a member of this Commission against his wishes, said at the time to a friend that the idea of the Commission as announced and constituted was a mistaken one as to any settlement of the pending questions in that way. He also said that he did "not believe anything could or would come out of it of the least consequence one way or the other," for "it is too much of a debating club—a big debating club, in fact, and it can never, by the very nature of things, agree upon any one thing that has been submitted, or all of the things."

Now, Mr. Speaker, we will come down from this folly and nonsense resultant of the work of the Jordan commission to the following statement of the actual condition of affairs on the seal islands to-day.

EXHIBIT F.

The condition to-day of the interests of the Government on the seal islands of Alaska is so bad that it fairly defies adequate description; it was bad in 1890; it was made still worse in 1893-94 by that result of the amazing incompetence of our agents and "experts" who ruined our case at Paris; then it has been intensified as a miserable condition of affairs by the additional increment derived from that idle and mischievous work of the Jordan-Thompson commission in 1896-97; it is now so settled that unless Congress provides the ways and means for a merciful and wise change, its existing shame and cruelty will exterminate the fur-seal species of Alaska. A brief review from the authentic records of the State and Treasury departments makes the following exhibit:

In 1893, on the 16th of August, the Bering Sea tribunal of arbitration, sitting in the city of Paris, rendered its decision against each and every count in our case then submitted to it.

Our claim of jurisdiction over the waters of Bering Sea was denied. Our claim of a property right in the fur seal was denied to us, in spite of weeks of legal vaporing on the part of our agents to gain its recognition, and, worst and most of all, our claim to the protection of our fur-seal herd from indecent and ruinous slaughter was, by the wretched bungling and dense ignorance of our agents, also denied to us. These agents at the date of the rendition of this verdict telegraphed to the people of this country that a "great victory" was won by them!

At that time most of our people who had given any attention to this subject were prepared to lose the first two claims; but they did not realize until the end of the season of 1894 that the regulations ordered by that Bering Sea tribunal, after being faithfully enforced during the sealing season of 1894, instead of saving our fur-seal herd from scandalous and ruinous slaughter, actually facilitated that very evil. The pelagic catch of 1894 was the largest ever known in the entire history of that business, and it still keeps that record.

In December, 1894, the late Governor Dingley, and the then Secretary of State, Judge Gresham, after repeated conferences and careful consideration of every phrase of this improper condition of affairs on the seal islands of Alaska, drew up a bill (H. R. 8033) for Congressional action, which was in substance, and indeed is literally, the same as the one now before the Ways and Means Committee. It was delayed in the House on account of the difficulty in promptly getting the exact figures of that immense pelagic catch of 1894 verified to the full satisfaction of the Treasury officials, and it was not acted on in the committee until the 18th of February, 1895. It was then unanimously reported (Rep. No. 1849) by the chairman, Mr. W. L. Wilson, to the House, and passed by a unanimous vote of that body the 22d of February. This was, however, too late for action in the Senate before the sine die adjournment of Congress on March 4, 1895.

This bill was again introduced by Governor Dingley (H. R. 3206) at the opening of the Fifty-fourth Congress, referred to the Ways and Means Committee, unanimously reported (Report No. 451) by him from that committee, and passed by the House, February 25, 1896, after full debate, without a dissenting vote. It was reported from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by Mr. FRYE on March 4, and made a special order for March 16, 1896.

At this point the successor to Judge Gresham as Secretary of State, Richard Olney, stepped in and took the responsibility of informing Senator FRYE that he was "successfully negotiating" with Great Britain at that moment for the betterment of affairs on the Seal Islands, and hence the passsage of the pending seal bill "would greatly embarrass" him, "if not totally defeat the object in view."

This gave no alternative to Mr. FRYE or the friends of the bill. It was dropped, and the day it was dropped Canada got the better of our officials, as usual. She steered Mr. Richard Olney into the creation of the Jordan-Thompson Commission early in June, 1896, and then engineered the business so as to secure from our agents in this commission, Messrs. Jordan and Hamlin, a complete surrender of our complaint against pelagic sealing in the "joint statement of conclusions," etc., which these gentlemen unwittingly signed on the 16th of November, 1897, with their British associates, in the State Department.

In order that the committee may see clearly just what a mess of the business Jordan and Hamlin succeeded in making, I have prepared an analysis of the "joint statement" by which our case has been officially denied and surrendered through these agents, and I hereby submit it, as an appendix to these statements which I am now making. (See Exhibits VIII, IX.)

The committee will at once observe that each and every item of fact which condemned the infamous industry of pelagic sealing, that was prepared for the use of that conference by Dr. Jordan, into which he had been steered by the Canadians and John W. Foster, has been surrendered abjectly by that gentleman.

There is not a word, or a whispered word, in this "joint statement of conclusions" which admits that the chief cause of cruel death and waste of life is due to the effects of pelagic sealing, i. e., the starvation of the motherless young, or even hints at it.

There is not a word, or a whispered word, in any one of these items of agreement between Dr. Jordan and his British associates that suggests, even, the suppression of pelagic sealing, and not a word which hints at the impending extermination of the fur seal.

This outcome is bad enough—is pitiful enough for us if it stopped there; but, unfortunately for our case, it does not. The fifteenth item of agreement declares that a state of "equilibrium" has been reached in the business, whereby the herd has so diminished in number that taking it on land and in the water has ceased to be a profitable industry for either ourselves or the Canadian hunters. This is true, indeed, for our side; it is wholly true; but it is utterly untrue for the Canadian side. Not only have the Canadian hunters increased their profits more than 100 per cent since this "agreement" was signed, but they have increased their annual killing up to 28,552 in 18 8 to 34,000 in 1899, to 35,191 in 1900; and to about 25,000 in 1901, as against 24,532 seales taken by them in 1897, when this "equilibrium" was declared; and the price per skin has advanced from $6.50 in 1897 to $16 during these periods up to date. (See Exhibit III, appended, showing the land and pelagic catch, with prices realized, 1871-1901.)

In the meantime, our killing on the islands is running into the dregs of that surplus male life which alone we can kill.

This improper and unwarranted official negation of each and every one of our vital indictments of the Canadian work and its cruel, indecent result leaves to-day that remnant of our fur-seal herd now existing on the Pribilof Islands completely at the mercy of a band of alien sea wolves—absolutely in that control in so far as any attempt that can now be made by the State or the Treasury Departments to free it is concerned. Congress alone, and of its own initiation, must act in the premises or the shame and the cruelty that now characterizes this business will be followed in 1907 by the total destruction of the male life on the seal islands.

Let me try to make this statement clear as to indefinite continuation:

Out of the 4,500,000 fur seals of all classes which I found on the Pribilof rookeries in 1872-1874 only about 225,000 of all classes were left alive on those rookeries last year. Of this aggregate, about 100,000 were breeding females and their young, 80,000 pups, the balance being the yearlings of both sexes, and about 4,000 old bulls on the breeding grounds. Every young male seal above 1 year old that could be secured on the islands last summer was taken, 22,672 of them.

The male life was so reduced last season that only about 1,826 first-class skins were secured in the total catch of 22,627. The balance of the catch were small skins, smaller than have been taken by our people at any time before or since 1889-90 on the killing grounds. This clearly shadows out the collapse of the surplus male catch of good skins on the islands this season; it has taken place last year (1901) on the Russian islands (those islands not having had the saving restraint upon them of the modus vivendi of 1891-1893, which stopped all killing on the Pribilofs for that time, save a few thousand food skins).

But with the remnant of the female life of the herd it is otherwise. Under existing conditions our people are prohibited from killing or even molesting them on the land or in the sea—on the land by special acts of Congress, 1868 and 1870, and in the sea by act of 1897. The British pelagic hunter, however, has the right to kill these female seals at sea during certain months of the year, and as that right to kill these seals, which we now so carefully breed and protect for his use and gain, has been given to him by the highest court on earth, he never will surrender it to us unless we offer him in exchange for it something vastly more valuable—some right of our own people, which we will never agree to do.

But the continuation of this work of the pelagic hunter prevents us from checking the killing of all the best of the young males as they haul out annually; it is manifestly wrong for us to save this life on the islands only for the alien hunters to kill at sea. Since 1896 we have never permitted a young breeding bull to pass from the killing grounds to the breeding grounds. If a 1-year-old escaped last summer he is reasonably sure to be killed this season as a 2-year-old; if by any chance he does scrape through unseen he will certainly be skinned as a 3-year-old in 1903; and if by a miracle he should slip through he will never get beyond 1904 as a 4-year-old.

So, in this manner, it will be observed that the young male life can not reach the breeding grounds under the system in vogue to-day, and we can not change it in sense or reason unless the pelagic sealer is put out of business. We take all the young males just as rapidly and as sure as they land. The pelagic hunter gets 20 per cent of his catch also made up by their lives, plus the female seals which he builds 80 per cent of his work and profit upon, and which we can not touch under existing laws.

Therefore it can be seen at once that the males are subjected to an extra natural death rate from two fires—they are killed on the land and killed in the sea; while the females have only one such fire to withstand, or the extra natural death rate from killing at sea, since they are now so carefully bred and preserved from injury on the islands, by ourselves from ourselves, and at our sole cost.

Consequently the male life will go out first, and it has gone with geometrical or fourfold rapidity as contrasted with the exit of the female life. Hence, while the male life is fairly gone, and has been drawn upon to the dregs during this last season, the end of the female life will yet be long drawn out on the islands under the present order of affairs.

To this prolongation of that cruel and unmanly killing of nursing mother seals at sea—thousands and tens of thousands of them annually—entailing, as it does, the torture of slow starvation to death of the thousands and tens of thousands of their helpless offspring on the islands of their birth every September and October—to this extension of cruelty and barbarous work every man and woman in this broad land of ours protests, and will protest, who has the least idea of what is going on. It can be ended and the imposition and nuisance abated by passing this bill, which lays out the only path that reaches to it over which we can travel.

At this point of so killing off the seals on the islands as to put the Canadian hunter out of business, I desire to call your attention to a very important reservation that travels with the execution of the act as ordered. I refer to the fact that at least ten to fifteen thousand breeding seals will be left alive on the rookeries; their retention will not be of the least use to the pelagic hunter—so small a number signifies nothing for him, when searching for them in the high sea, and out of business he must go; he will not even think of sailing out and up into Bering Sea next summer if we pass this bill at once.

What does the existence of ten or fifteen thousand breeding fur seals signify to us? It means that in ten years time they will have so increased as to be tenfold as numerous as they are to-day, and in fifteen years a half million of them. Therefore, gentlemen, you will easily comprehend the fact that the passage and enforcement of the provisions of the pending bill not only puts the infamous work of the pelagic hunter down—entirely down—but it in no way orders, or even suggests, the extermination of the herd; it gives the unhappy animals a merciful rest and eliminates cruelty and indecency.

To continue this self-confessed imposition on the seal islands of Alaska is to fly into the face of good reason, to outrage the best impulse of humanity, and to please no instincts of our own save those of greed, cruelty, and indecency.

In view of these facts you will observe, Mr. Speaker, that the business on the islands has reached the dregs—that while the pelagic hunter has a relatively long rope yet left, we have reached the end of ours. The following exhibit eloquently describes the result of last season's catch on the islands:

EXHIBIT G.

Analysis of the island or "Alaska" catch of male fur seals, taken on the Pribilof Islands, season of 1901; sold in London, December 17, 1901; classification made by sale catalogue of C. M. Lampson & Co.

Sizes.	All males.	Average weight per skin.	Price per skin.
			1901.	1900.
		Pounds.
4-year-olds	244	10 to 11	$40.50	$38.25
3-year-olds	1,582	7 to 8	38.75	37.50
2-year-olds	3,922	5½ to 6½	33.50	31.25
1-year-olds	16,079	4 to 5	22.25	24.00
Total	21,827

With 449 skins, which can not be included in the above classification, since they are entered as "faulty," "cut," etc., and sold way down. The skins are larded with a half pound of blubber to a pound each when cured in the salt. The 4-year-old skins will often have 2 pounds of blubber adherent

This showing as above cited is the official record of the sale, and it declares to us the significant fact that about only 1,826 prime skins could be found on the Pribilof Islands during the season of 1901, in spite of the extension of the driving into the 15th of August, or the opening of the "stagy" season. It also shows that the dregs of the young male life are being drawn upon, and will continue to be, with the high prices prevailing, owing to the self-evident scarcity of supply.

For a better understanding of the rapid decline in the numbers of the male life of the Pribilof herd the following analysis of the island or "Alaska" catch of male fur seals taken on the Pribilof Islands, season of 1897, is given for comparison with the foregoing analysis of the catch for 1901:

Sizes.	All males.	Average weight per skin.	Average price per skin, 1897.
		Pounds.
4-year-olds	1,997	10 to 11	$22.00
3-year-olds	5,329	7 to 8	19.00
2-year-olds	13,000	5½ to 6½	14.00
Total	20,326

Of which about 1,000 came over from 1896, "food" skins.

Note the fact that in 1897 there were nearly eight times as many 4-year-olds as in 1901; there were four times as many 3-year-olds, and a little over thrice as many 2-year-olds, and that no 1-year-olds or "eye-plaster" skins were taken. The price was too low; hence they escaped. But the price climbed up in 1900, so that by 1901 every 1-year-old was secured if hauled out, or four-fifths of the entire catch of 1901 is made up of these little seals.

In 1897 they only took the "long" 2-year-olds or the best grown ones. They did not take all that hauled out because the price did not warrant them in so doing.

This analysis of 1897 gives a graphic contrast with that of 1901 and eloquently declares the rapidity with which the young male life is being eliminated on the islands.

Now, take the Canadian hunters' catch; observe the following:

EXHIBIT H.

Analysis of the pelagic catch of fur seal for the season of 1901, taken from the sale catalogue of C. M. Lampson & Co., as sold in London, December 17, 1901. Out of the 25,000 skins taken last year only 13,611 were offered at this sale. This catch is taken entirely from the Pribilof herd by Canadian hunters, and is known to buyers as "northwest coast" skins.

Male and female skins.	Average price per skin.
	1901.	1900.
76 skins of "wigs" (adult males)	$17.67	$11.26
98 skins of "4-year-olds," 10 to 11 pound skins	17.67	19.12
This grade is composed of males.
1,468 skins of "3-year-olds," 8½ to 9 pound skins	16.85	19.12
This is nearly 80 per cent male grade.
2,451 skins of "short 3-year-olds," 6½ to 7½ pound skins	18.62	19.58
This grade is nearly 90 per cent female skins.
2,730 skins of "long 2-year-olds," 5½ to 6 pound skins	19.00	20.04
This grade is nearly 90 per cent female skins.
2,670 skins of "short 2-year-olds," 5 to 5½ pound skins	17.50	18.35
This grade is nearly 90 per cent female skins.
2,531 skins of "long yearlings," 4 to 5 pound skins	13.75	14.50
This grade is about 50 per cent female skins.
1,159 skins of "yearlings," 3½ to 4 pound skins	10.40	10.85
This grade is about 50 per cent female skins.
296 skins of "short yearlings," 3 pound skins	7.25	10.25

Total of 13,107 skins, leaving a balance of 500 skins which I can not classify, since they are entered as "faulty," "cut," etc.

This sale shows that about 4,000 skins out of the 13,611 offered are male skins; the balance females. (See Exhibit III, appended.)

In this statement of catch and prices realized it is at once clearly established that the Canadian hunter is making a great profit out of his infamous business; that the "agreement" which Jordan made with the Canadians is utterly silly in its conclusion that pelagic sealing had ceased in 1897 to render any profit to its promoters. Those profits have increased 100 per cent.

These hunters have made an enormous profit during the last two seasons, and everything points to a steady continuance of it until they exterminate the species, if we are willing to hold the bag for them—to stupidly pay for the piper while they dance.

Let us look at the cost of settling up this cruel, barbarous, and indecent business for the gain of a few Canadian butchers while they exterminate the life for us. The trouble fairly began in 1890, and the following exhibit will show what an imposition it has been, and is to-day, upon the public Treasury:

EXHIBIT J.

Showing the cost of the futile Navy and Revenue Marine seal patrol of Bering Sea and the North Pacific Ocean.

The following extract is taken from the official report of Commander Clark (now Captain Clark, of the Oregon, and so well known to us since the Santiago naval fight), which was made by him at the close of his season's work of directing the patrol in Bering Sea, 1894, and after he had personally observed the operations of the pelagic sealing fleet during the entire period of their hunting outside of the "60-mile zone." The shame and the cruelty of the whole business so deeply impressed him that he makes the following statement:

NAVY-YARD, MARE ISLAND, CAL., October 27, 1894.

SIR: In compliance with the Department's instructions dated September 25, 1894, * * * I have the honor to submit the following report, upon the movements of the seal herd in its progress toward Bering Sea, and upon seal life in general. * * *

It was, of course not foreseen when the award was signed by the tribunal of arbitration that a slaughter so destructive to the life of the herd could be carried on under its provisions, or that one of its results would be of so cruel a nature that anything approaching a parallel to it would not be tolerated in a stock-raising community. It is proper to remark here that a starving seal pup will live nearly six weeks. While sealing was only permitted outside of Bering Sea, the catch may have been as great, or even greater, but it was more equally divided between the sexes, and if a pup was lost when a female was killed, then it had not yet been born. If the pelagic sealer is to secure all the profits to be made during the few years that he requires to exterminate the herd, it would seem to be more in the interests of humanity, as well as sound policy, to anticipate his action. * * *

C. E. CLARK,
Commander, United States Navy.

(Sen. Ex. Doc. 67, 53d Cong., 3d sess., p. 431, No. 251.)

The idle and farcical patrol of Bering Sea and the North Pacific Ocean since 1891 down to date by vessels of the United States has cost the public Treasury an enormous sum—money and time of public servants utterly thrown away in burlesque effort. The following statement of that cruising taken from the official reports of the Secretary of the Treasury lights up the truth of the foregoing statement beyond successful contradiction.

For the enforcement of the patrol ordered by the modus vivendi of 1891–1893 and the regulations of the Bering Sea Tribunal put into effect first in May, 1894, and continued to date, the following vessels have been engaged, number and character, per annum, as given below:

1891, 3 United States ships of war, 3 revenue-marine cutters; 1892, 4 United States ships of war, 3 revenue-marine cutters; 1893, 4 United States ships of war, 3 revenue-marine cutters; 1894, 4 United States ships of war, 3 revenue-marine cutters; 1895, 5 revenue-marine cutters; 1896, 6 revenue-marine cutters; 1897, 4 revenue-marine cutters; 1898, no mention of it; 1899, 5 revenue-marine cutters; 1900, 5 revenue-marine cutters; 1901, 5 revenue-marine cutters.

The cost of the cruising in 1891, 1892, 1893, and 1894, when the United States naval fleet combined with the Revenue-Marine cutters, was annually between $450,000 to $494,000. The protest of the naval officers against this useless and idle patrol on their part with ships of war caused the Government to drop that feature and put the entire patrol into the Revenue-Marine. The cost of maintaining a Revenue-Marine cutter for this Alaskan cruising averages $40,000 per year for coal, wages, supplies, and repairs. (See statement of Secretary Carlisle, following.)

Taking these five Revenue-Marine cutters from the ports and districts where they were assigned on the Atlantic and Pacific into this Alaskan district, 1890–1894, has given the good excuse and real need for the building and equipment of six new cutters since then to fill their places.

Therefore it will be at once clearly observed that the annual cost of this patrol of Bering Sea to the public Treasury has never been less than $200,000 to $240,000 since 1895, unless for 1898, when the Spanish war may have drawn most of the Revenue-Marine cutters out of the field, for it is not specified in the Secretary of the Treasury's report to Congress for that year.

The following extract is made from the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, January 22, 1897, to the President of the United States Senate in answer to an inquiry by that body as to the cost of policing Bering Sea, and other matters. (Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, Doc. No. 81, p. 5.)

"As to the cost of policing Bering Sea and the North Pacific each year since 1890, I have to state that the honorable the Secretary of the Navy upon request has informed this Department that the cost of maintaining vessels of the United States Navy in these waters since 1890, including pay and rations of officers and crews and repairs to the vessels during and immediately following the performance of said patrol duty, was as follows:

1890	No patrol by Navy.
1891	$133,281.64
1892	233,231.31
1893	183,067.74
1894	452,768.18
1895	No patrol by Navy.

The expense incurred by revenue cutters in patrolling Bering Sea from 1890 to 1895, inclusive, including pay and rations of officers and men, is as follows:

1890	$36,846.66
1891	51,650.70
1892	66,672.57
1893	47,385.79
1894	53,439.63
1895	148,677.74

From these figures it would seem that the total cost of policing these waters during the period in question is $1,410,721.96.

The amounts which have been expended by the Government for the support of the native inhabitants of the seal islands of Alaska follow:

1893	$11,337.32
1894	18,319.44
1895	25,563.21

While not requested by the resolution, I append a statement of the amounts expended for salaries and traveling expenses of agents to the seal fisheries of Alaska each year since the date of the first appropriation for that purpose:

1876	$2,752.68	1886	$7,937.49
1877	8,080.49	1887	16,174.13
1878	10,892.50	1888	10,184.52
1879	16,381.78	1889	13,027.10
1880	9,571.62	1890	10,747.71
1881	4,248.09	1891	15,396.83
1882	15,203.06	1892	16,071.33
1883	11,090.32	1893	11,168.27
1884	13,811.64	1894	10,953.09
1885	13,102.61	1895	10,308.38

Total cost—
Policing waters	$1,410,721.96
Support of natives	55,219.97
Salaries and expenses of agents	227,163.04
Total	1,693,104.97

Respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary

Then, if the cost of the Paris junket, 1893, is added, $224,514, and the damage award paid by us to the sealers (1875–76), $473,000, we have Carlisle's total swelled to $2,390,619.97; then add cost of patrol, 1896 to date, $1,450,000, giving a total of $3,840,619.97. Revenue from sealskin tax and rental, 1890–1901, inclusive, $2,110,000; net loss to public Treasury to date, $1,730,619.97.

It is not right, Mr. Speaker, to omit mention of the abortive and silly work which Dr. Jordan and his associates undertook on the seal islands in 1896–97. I refer to the tomfoolery known and extensively advertised at the time as the "successful" branding of fur seals, whereby the Canadian hunter was sure to be put out of business and the whole question settled by his suppression in that manner!

EXHIBIT K.

THE IMPOTENT WORK OF BRANDING FUR SEALS.

The idle idea of branding female fur seals, so as to destroy the value of their skins and thereby drive the pelagic sealer out of business, was actually attempted and put into practice on the Pribilof Islands in 1896, first by Jordan and his associates in a small way, and then worked by him up there in 1897 to the best of the ability of himself and his associates. This abortive, silly work was indorsed by Secretary Gage in his report for that year to Congress, and commended as a practicable solution of this sealing question, if the Canadians did not yield!

To the utter uselessness and cruelty of this scheme the attention of the Ways and Means Committee was called during Mr. Elliott's hearing February 18, 1896. But it seems that in spite of the protest which he made, this nonsense has actually had its day on the seal islands; but the futility and the cruelty of the job became too rank for its continuation, even by its authors, and it has been practically abandoned since 1898.

Little did the pelagic sealer care for the branding work, which was to ruin the value of his catch, since the trade reports show that he immediately increased his business when Jordan began his, and added immensely to his profits. When the small pups' skins were so "successfully" branded on the islands in 1897 the pelagic sealer received only $6 per pelt for his catch that year; to-day, after five years of this "successful operation" in "destroying the value of the skins," as Secretary Gage has officially described it, the pelagic sealer points with pride and infinite sarcasm to the fact that he gets $16 per pelt, or nearly three times as much as he did when the branding was not done.

THE OFFICIAL RECORD OF BRANDING SEALS SENT TO CONGRESS BY THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, LYMAN J. GAGE, 1897–1901.

[Secretary of Treasury, Report of (p. 29), 1897, Secretary Gage.]

"Renewed experiments were made also in the branding of female pup seals, several thousands being successfully branded in such a manner as to totally destroy the skins from a commercial standpoint, while in no wise injuring the health or vitality of the animal." (One hundred and eighteen cows branded on St. Paul by Associate Joseph Murray; 5,371 pups branded on St. Paul by Associate Joseph Murray; 1,800 pups branded on St. George by Treasury Agent Judd, and so reported. Total, 7,289 seals for 1897. To Dr. Jordan by Murray: "Great success," etc.)

"About 2,000 female fur-seal pups branded this season," etc.

In this connection the House will observe from the foregoing citations that the Secretary of the Treasury in his reports omits all mention of the "successful" branding of seal pups after 1897 until 1901, an interregnum of four years. Why does he refer to the botch job now? Nothing has been done on the islands as to that work to speak of until last season. Why is the folly again taken up?

Just think a moment of this cruel incident to any and all branding of seal pups. When those "2,000 female fur-seal pups" which the Secretary refers to as branded last season were driven up for that object, no living man could tell what proportion of their number were then or were soon to be deprived of their mothers, either at that moment or later in the season, by the pelagic hunters. Every one of those motherless seals died last fall of starvation on the islands. How many of these 2,000 freshly branded pups were thus deprived of support and then starved to death? We can not tell exactly; but a large number of them met that fate, and they each had the extra torture of burned backs to endure while so perishing, and all this to no earthly purpose whatever in so far as destroying the work of the pelagic hunter or the value of his catch, as the foregoing exhibits of the increased value of his skins since this work was undertaken attest.

The progress of this job of branding fur seals, since it was first put into practice on St. Pauls Island by Dr. Jordan, finally reached the ludicrous climax which is shown in the following carefully prepared statement given to the newspapers by Jordan himself, August 27, 1897, or within a week or so after he had left the islands, first in the New York Tribune of that date and repeated later, as follows:

"In conversation with a reporter recently Professor Jordan said:

"'I find that few people seem to realize how much the scheme of branding female seals is helping us to kill off the Canadian poachers. They must have found this year among the skins they took hundreds that were absolutely worthless to them by reason of the branding marks on the fur.

"This system of branding consists in placing a mark on the back of the animal with a hot iron, so that wherever the iron touches the fine fur is destroyed, making the skin so operated on entirely worthless for commercial purposes. Up to the present season it has been our custom to perform this branding operation with a red-hot bar, but we found that needless pain was being inflicted on the animals by this process, so we have made a change in the method. E. E. Farmer, of Stanford University, has invented a platinum wire pencil which draws its power from an electric dynamo. This pencil maintains a white heat and can be used with the greatest freedom, any sort of a mark being rapidly and easily made. Its great merit is that it inflicts no pain whatever on the animal." (Milwaukee Journal, Oct. 16, 1897, taken from a long syndicated article headed "Triumph of American diplomacy.")

Instead of "killing off the Canadian poachers" by this work, these gentry have simply increased their catch and their profits ever since Jordan fairly began the branding job. And still more, six weeks after this interview above quoted was given to the public, down came a statement of the utter failure of that costly electric-branding pencil and plant when put into actual work on the island which Jordan had just departed from. The Farmer job put up by Jordan was a complete failure, and has not been even suggested as worthy of a second trial by Jordan himself.

The Canadian and British agents upon the islands with Jordan at this time may have cunningly inspired Jordan with this folly of action and belief in branding. If they did not, who did? In their reports Thompson and Macoun do not make the slightest reference to it.

Having shown us how "the scheme of branding seals is helping us to kill off the Canadian poachers," Jordan does not want to absorb all the credit for this folly. He insists that—

"The branding idea originated in the mind of Joseph Murray, now chief Government agent of the rookeries. He was formerly a prominent cattleman in Colorado, and it was his experience with herds that gave him the idea of putting distinguishing marks on the seals." (Milwaukee Journal, October 16, 1897.)

This branding idea did not originate in the mind of Joseph Murray: It originated, in so far as any published record goes, by the statement of M. L. Washburn, who, as an employee of the Alaska Commercial Company, testified before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives, in the autumn of 1888, at Washington. (Fiftieth Congress, second session, Report No. 3883.) He did not go to the absurd length of the scheme that Jordan traveled, by any means. He made the suggestion that the seals might be branded with a mark which would make them Government property, positively and easily identified, no matter where taken or how far they had strayed away from the islands in the high seas.

There was, then, an excuse for Washburn's suggestion, since at that time some (though not many) of our good lawyers claimed that we had a property right in these seals, that they strayed away from the islands to feed, just as cattle did from a corral on the plains, and a "U. S." brand mark would be sufficient identification and proof of ownership.

But this claim was denied to us at Paris, 1893. Jordan, in 1896-97, had no such excuse; he put an idle conceit into futile practice.

Mr. Speaker, I come now to the real object and aim of my bill. It is to put the pelagic sealer out of business, and to save at the same time the fur-seal species. The history of the Russian ownership and management of the Pribilof seal herd throws the following clear, full light on what seems to have been completely hidden from or else willfully ignored for trade interests by Dr. Jordan and his associates:

EXHIBIT L.

THE RUSSIAN PERIOD OF GREAT DIMINUTION OF THE PRIBILOF FUR-SEAL HERD 1834–1844.

I bring this period in to show that the present loss of life on the fur-seal rookeries of the seal islands of Alaska is not the first experience of the kind which has been recorded by white men, or, rather, since this life came into the supervision and control of white men, in 1786–87; prior to that date these breeding grounds had been undiscovered by either savage or civilized men.

The Russian records show that from 1817 down to 1834 the supply of choice young male seals was constantly growing less and less as each year followed the other; they show that no such method of killing these seals at sea, now so well known to us as "pelagic sealing," was known to white men or practiced by them, or by the Alaskan natives, during the entire period of Russian ownership and control, ending in 1867; they show that this remarkable shrinkage of the herd from 1817 down to 1834 was due entirely to overdriving and culling of young male seals; they show that fourteen years before the utter collapse of the herd took place this result of ruin was announced by an official investigator, who urged, in 1820, that steps be taken then to avert the disaster, and they show that in spite of this clear note of warning and remonstrance the greed and the avarice of a Russian board of directors overruled Yanovsky's appeal; then they show that the end was reached in 1834, just as he had predicted under date of February 25, 1820, saying:

* * * "that every year the young bachelor seals are killed, and that only the cows, 'seecatchie' and 'polseecatchie' are left to propagate the species. It follows that only the old seals are left, while if any of the bachelors are left alive in the autumn they are sure to be killed next spring. The consequence is that the number of seals obtained diminishes every year, and it is certain that the species will, in time, become extinct." * * *

Then he asks that the killing be stopped altogether in 1821; and then, when resumed in 1822, that only 40,000 be killed, etc., etc. (Proc. Tribunal of Arbitration Bering Sea, Vol. 8, pp. 323-325, No. 6, 1893.)

To this warning and remonstrance against overdriving and killing young male seals on the Pribilof Islands in 1820 the Russian board of directors from St. Petersburg, under date of March 15, 1821, made the following reply and denial: "That although they concur in Mr. Yanorsky's view they have decided not to adopt the measures proposed by him," etc.

What was the result?

The entire disappearance of the killable young male life on the islands in 1834. Then came the long rest of ten years on these rookeries before killing to any noteworthy extent of young males was or could be resumed.

In 1834 the Russian records show that just 100 "halluschickie" were taken—all that could be secured on St. Paul Island "safely"—"leaving in 1835 for breeding, 8,118 fresh young seals, males and females together." (Veniaminov: Zapieskie, etc., Vol. II, p. 568 et seq., 1842.)

Here is the authentic record made by an unusually intelligent and personally well-informed man, written in 1837, that less than 9,000 seals that were "fresh and young" were left alive on St. Paul Island in 1835—reduced to this feeble remnant entirely by excessive killing on the island of young male seals; yet we have had two commissions of our "experts" and scientists visit those rookeries, in 1891 and in 1896-97, only to return and stupidly deny this record, and charge every harm to that herd upon the pelagic sealer and his work since 1886.

Bishop Veniaminov's count of 8,118 seals left on the St. Paul grounds in 1835 was an authentic one, made by the "Bidarshik" Kazean Shaieshnikov, who was the head man and in charge of the island; he also was the man who entertained Yanovsky, in 1819, during the whole of that season, while his investigation was being made then, and which resulted in Yanovsky's warning report, which is quoted above.

This unquestioned record of the Russians is of the greatest interest to us at this hour, because it shows the recuperative powers of the fur-seal herd. Here in 1835 we have but 8,118 young seals left out of millions that existed on the same ground in 1790-1800. In 1857 the Russian records declare that this remnant of 1835 had so multiplied that it overflowed on the breeding grounds way up to and even beyond the utmost limit it had ever occupied in the days of its finest form and number when first discovered by man; and that no further concern as to the number taken annually need bother the board of directors.

The gentlemen of this committee will, in the light of that record, easily understand how safe it is for us to put the pelagic sealer out of business by killing off these 100,000 female seals now existing down to a residuum of 10,000 or 15,000, and then still have in reserve sufficient power to restore the herd, ample in every respect.

The Russian record of diminution to the point of complete collapse begins in 1817, and is given to us by Bishop Veniaminov, who himself spent the season of 1825 on the islands, and who had free access to all the records of the Russian-American Company. He closed this record in 1837 and its continuation, quoted below, is taken from the record made by Kazean Shaiesnikov, who lived on St. Paul Island during the time covered by it.

In 1874, when Mr. Elliott was investigating this particular subject on the Pribilof Islands, he called a meeting of the natives at St. Pauls village (August) and asked them to give him their best recollection of this sudden drop in the number of seals taken on their island in 1835. After long and patient interchange of opinion among themselves, they gave him the following statement of the actual number of old breeding seals left alive on the St. Paul rookeries at the close of the season's killing in 1834 and during the season of 1835. He asked them this question because Bishop Veniaminor says (quoted above) that in 1835 only "8,118 fresh, young seals, males and females together," were left on St. Pauls Island for breeding. If that were so, how could 4,052 of them be taken in 1835 and then have 4,220 taken in 1836 without completely ending the business?

The St. Paul natives agreed upon the following census for 1835:

	Cows.
Lagoon rookery had 2 bulls	2,000
Zapadine rookery had	1,000
Novastoshnah rookery had	1,500
Polavina rookery had	500
Lukannon Ketavie rookery had 10 bulls	300
Reef and Garbotch rookery had 10 bulls and 20 bulls	1,800
Nahspeel rookery had	100
Total of	7,200

[This census of the natives he has recorded in his report on the "Condition of affairs in Alaska," 1874, p. 119.]

Now, this total of 7,200 old breeding seals as given by these natives agrees pretty well with the bishop's sum of 8,118 "fresh young seals" but it still puzzled Elliott to understand how they could take, or would dare to take, more than half of the entire number in 1835, and then follow it up with a practical extirpation of the life in 1836, according to the figures of the bishop's table.

But in 1890 he stumbled upon the following record, which explains the question completely and satisfactorily. The natives were right, and so was the bishop:

List of the killing for furs and other purposes since the Zapooska of 1835.

[An autographic list made by the "Deacon" and "Bidarshik" Kazean Shaiesnikov, who was the headman on St. Pauls Island during the entire period covered, and it was put in Elliott's hands July 2, 1890, by his son, Father Paul Shaiesnikov.]

Year.	"Hollus-chickie" (or killable male seals).	"Sairie kotic-kov" (or "gray pups" about 5 months old).
1835	100	3,952
1836	1,200	2,840
1837	2,000	2,020
1838	2,500	1,380
1839	5,000	.230
1840	5,350	.650
1841	7,100	.900
1842	8,800	1.200
1843	10,050	1.294
1844	10,150	2.632
1845	9,550	3.428
1846	12,000	3.503
1847	13,300	3.708
1848	13,600	3.370
1849	10,000	3.350
1850	5,530	.538
1851	10,295	.935
1852	9,380	1.250
1853	13,906	1.700
1854	33,861	1.400

With this "list" in Elliott's hand, at once the table of Veniaminov, quoted above, becomes intelligible. Without it it is impossible to reconcile his statement that all killing was stopped in 1835, on the one hand, with his table showing 4,052 killed, on the other; but now we see that the Bishop's total for that year on St. Paul was only "100" skins of "bachelor" or killable seals and "3,952" skins of pups or "gray pups" (5 months old). So, in fact, the killing for market was literally stopped. The pups were taken by the natives for food and clothing; but it will be observed that just as soon as the herd began to increase again the killing of pups was discontinued, and the food supply requisite taken from the "bachelor" carcasses.

When regarding this point in 1874, and trying to discover the real cause of this complete collapse of the herd, Elliott was led to a false conclusion by a misunderstanding of what the natives said and Veniaminov's record affirmed, as to the taking of female seals for their skins in those early days of decline. He understood them then to mean that in taking female seals, as they did, that the driving was made from the rookery grounds as well as from the hauling grounds, and not changed to males alone until 1845. On this false understanding he based his conclusion that the seals were either harassed away from their breeding grounds, or were decimated by a plague or epidemic to such an extent that nothing remained but a remnant in 1834, and he so stated it then. (P. 120, Condition of Affairs in Alaska, 1874.)

But his investigations on the ground in 1890 led him to the truth as declared by the Russian agent, Yanovsky, in 1820, and Veniaminov's record of 1817-1837 then became perfectly consistent and intelligible to him and to us.

The Russian driving never, after the work of 1805–1808, entered the rookery grounds or breeding areas; but as these drives were kept up all through the season, from June 1 to the end of November annually, a certain number of cows were swept into the driven bands, since many of these females (after the breeding season had ended, by August 1) scattered out from the rookeries over the hauling grounds, where the drivers secured their daily quotas.

Once incorporated in the drive, the female was killed along with the male, as it was the rule of the Russians to take everything that they brought up to the killing grounds, except the very old or very young seals, regardless of sex. They had use for all grades of skins, and were not hampered by a uniform tax, to be paid upon every skin taken, regardless of its size or quality, as our people have been.

Illustrative of this, in 1854, 43,000 skins were taken on St. Paul and St. George islands; of this number, 20,000 were 1 and 2 year old skins and were sent to New York; 15,000 were 2 and 3 year old skins and sent to St. Petersburg, and 6,000 were 3 and 4 and 5 year old skins, "big skins" or "medium bulls," and they were sent to the Chinese market; the balance of this catch was used in the "colony" (Alaska). The average female skin will grade in size and weight and quality with the best 2-year-old male; my understanding of the proportion of female skins taken in these Russian drives, as above described, makes it about 10 per cent of the whole season's catch; or, say, for instance, some 4,500 female seals were taken in the 43,000 catch of 1854, being swept into the drives which were all made on the "hauling grounds" during August-November of that year.

In taking this record of the bishop, and also that legend of the natives into consideration, I believe that since these early enumerations were made of only the grown seals, i. e., all above the pups, then it is right to assume that there were about 15,000 seals of that class on the rookeries, instead of 7,200; the absence of more than half to two-thirds of the mother seals at any one time during the height of the breeding season on these rookeries makes a count of the cows at any one time deceptive and far below the reality. Elliott saw the necessity, first of all men, of counting the pups as a safe basis of enumeration of the cows; this he did early in 1872, and proceeded on that line all through his work.

There is no reason to question the accuracy of Veniaminov's figures of 1834. The legendary count given by the natives in 1874 to Maynard and Elliott is not worthy of so much credit; and did it stand alone, we should not place much specific importance to it, except in a general way, as illustrating an era of great loss of life on the rookeries. But coming to Elliott as it did, and without knowledge or prompting of the Bishop's record, for it gives details which he does not publish, I regard it as a valuable addition to the truth of the Bishop's account.

The natives, in 1874, when giving Elliott this description and census of 1834-35, differed among themselves as to the cause. A majority of them charged it up to an extraordinary "frozen summer" by which the islands were surrounded by solid ice floes way into the middle of August, thus shutting out the mother seals from coming ashore to bear their young, etc.; several of the older natives, however, dissented. But Elliott noticed the fact that Veniaminov is silent about this "ice age" in 1834–35. He would not have been had such a condition prevailed, since he was then living and busily engaged in preparing this work of his, "Zapieska ob Oonalashkenskaho Otdayla."

He had direct annual letters from Shaiesnikov, who was in charge of St. Pauls Island, and who was the man who counted the seals (8,118) for him, and who remained in charge until his death in 1854. Shaiesnikov is eulogized by the bishop, and also highly commended for ability and faithfulness by the general manager at Sitka, in many letters and documents.

We have records of ice floes that have shut the islands up against the landing of vessels until the middle of July in one or two instances, and frequently until the 20th and 25th of June for St. Paul; but these floes were "hanging" or "drifting" raft floes, "anchored to the islands," with open water all around on every side, and pierced with "lanes" or reaches of open water, through which the seals could and did land as usual. A brisk gale from any point of the compass will quickly sweep the ice away. Without such a wind these floes "hang" or "anchor" around the islands until very late.

Veniaminov, with all the records of the work in his possession, and living at the time, says deliberately that this collapse of the fur-seal herd on the Pribilof Islands, culminating in 1834, was due entirely to "excessive" and "wicked killing" of the young male life ("Zapieska," etc., vol. 2, p. 568, St. Petersburg, 1842); and Yanovsky predicted it, in 1820, as certain to come unless the culling and killing of choice young males was stopped.

These tables of Russian diminution, contrasted with the figures of our own time and trouble, show plainly enough that history is repeating itself on the islands to-day; that the utter and total destruction of the male fur-seal life up there will be accomplished under existing law, regulations, and trade conditions by 1906 unless we pass the pending bill, for unless we stop our work on the islands we can not save the species; but it is silly and useless to stop our people unless at the same time we stop the pelagic hunters. The enactment of this bill will stop them at once. Nothing else can or will.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, let me draw the following picture from the life on the seal islands to-day:

The female seal, heavy with her unborn young, hauls out on the Pribilof breeding grounds early in July. In a day or two after landing she gives birth to her "pup," and after suckling it for a day or two she leaves it, gorged with her milk, to sleep and rest on the rookery until she shall return.

She goes off for food—away to sea in the west or northwest, anywhere from 80 to 120 miles from the island to the favored fishing banks of her kind; while out there, either as she feeds or sleeps between meals, she is struck by the pelagic hunter's spear, and her quivering body thrown onto the deck of his vessel, where her skin is cut from the flesh, and her blood and mother's milk run down into the scuppers, commingled.

This is indecent enough in itself, but it is not the worst; that helpless "pup" which she left behind her on the island in a day or two begins to grow hungry and to thirst; it rouses itself to long, loud calls for its butchered mother; then subsides for short and fitful intervals of rest; day after day does this little creature repeat this wailing of hunger and thirst—week after week, until it finally sinks into death.

Multiply this example of tortured life twenty thousand times; then you will get a faint idea of what this abominable shamble on the seal islands of Alaska is and was during every September and October since 1893.

How long, Mr. Speaker, would you permit such a cruel and indecent exhibition as this to go on, year after year, in your district? How long would you permit this shame and brutality to be prolonged, if, after fifteen consecutive years of failure on the part of your bungling agents and inexperienced joint commissions, the same official wrecks were to ask you now, to-day, to keep the wretched business open so that they might continue to play with its misery?

Let us make a merciful ending to this infamous business of the pelagic hunter. The shortest and the happiest ending will follow the passage of this bill; it is the only step left for us to take in the premises which will surely preserve the Alaskan fur-seal species from that cruel and indecent extermination which is right at hand if it is not enacted.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman from New York expect to use the balance of his time?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, that the President now has power to enter into negotiations as contemplated by this bill, I respectfully submit that such is not the fact. The findings of the Jordan-Thompson commission some years ago have been construed by the representatives of the Canadian government and by others as tying the hands of the State Department, and that this is so for two reasons: One is that there is no money appropriated for the purpose of conducting negotiations for any modification of the existing regulations; second, because of the alleged findings of fact by the Jordan-Thompson commission. Now, to show you how this Jordan-Thompson agreement is interpreted by the Canadians, I will read from an interview published in Toronto, November 27, 1897, giving what Sir Louis Davies said:

Sir Louis H. Davies, at a meeting of Liberals here last night, referred to his recent visit to Washington to attend the seal conference. He said: "The seal experts settled the question of fact in such a way that hereafter it can not be opened up. We know exactly where we are. * * * They were told (the Americans) that the right to catch seals, being a national right, vindicated by the great Paris tribunal as a legitimate industry on the part of British subjects, could not be disposed of for a mere money consideration, and that Canada did not sell national rights for money."

So that it is absolutely impossible for the executive branch of the Government to open negotiations, and it is so interpreted, not only here, but also in Canada and Great Britain.

Section 5 is objected to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCLELLAN], but only because under certain conditions it vests in the executive branch of the Government absolute authority to take the seal life on the Pribilof Islands, except 10,000 females and 1,000 males. Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if these negotiations are not reopened, that if the present regulations for the protection and preservation of the herd are not so amended as to prevent the butchery carried on by the pelagic sealer, that herd will be absolutely extinct in a very few years, especially at the rate at which it is being depleted now. And then what have you done? You have destroyed the herd, and how? You have destroyed it by starving thousands and tens of thousands of seal pups on the Pribilof Islands whose mothers have been butchered in the open sea when out upon the feeding grounds to regain sustenance for the young she has left behind.

Now, if this herd is to be butchered in that cruel and inhuman manner, if it is to be exterminated, let us do it, then, in a decent manner, and not by means of starvation. But I do not anticipate that it will ever be necessary to exercise this discretionary authority. I believe that with that provision in this bill the State Department, or the Executive through the State Department, will be able to open or reopen this subject and secure such a modification as will prevent the present inhuman practices of the pelagic hunter. The 60-mile zone within which no seal can be killed either by American citizen or British subject is not closed to Japan or to Russia, and will not be closed until the pelagic hunters of Great Britian or Canada cease their inhuman work. That being so, and at the rate these vessels are now fitting out in Yokahoma, it will be, I say, a very short time when the pelagic sealer will have entirely destroyed this seal life, and the Government of the United States will be deprived of enjoying the benefit of its own property; for I believe, notwithstanding the findings of the Bering Sea tribunal, these fur seal are the property of the United States, whether they are on land or sea. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill with amendments.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that he was in doubt.

The House divided, and there were—ayes, 72; noes, 23.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Fifteen gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number; the yeas and nays are denied; and, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules are suspended and the bill is passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS CHOCTAWHATCHEE RIVER, IN GENEVA COUNTY, ALA.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 16881) to authorize the court of county commissioners of Geneva County, Ala., to construct a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River, in Geneva County, Ala.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the rules be suspended and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken, and, in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

RESERVATION AND SALE OF TOWN SITES ON THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 6278).

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 6278) to extend the provisions of chapter 8, title 32, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "Reservation and sale of town sites on the public lands," to the ceded Indian lands in the State of Minnesota.

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 8, title 32, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "Reservation and sale of town sites on the public lands," be, and is hereby, extended to and declared to be applicable to ceded Indian lands within the State of Minnesota. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. A second is demanded.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report in my time.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read in the gentleman's time.

The report (by Mr. EDDY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6278) to extend the provisions of chapter 8, title 32, of the Revised Statutes, entitled "Reservations and sale of town sites on public lands," to ceded Indian lands in the State of Minnesota, have had the same under consideration and report the bill with the recommendation that the same do pass.

Under the Nelson law (act of January 14, 1889, 25 Stat. L., 24) as amended by the Morris law (act of June 27, 1902) there is only one way by which the ceded lands on the Chippewa Indian reservations in Minnesota can be disposed of, and that is under the homestead law. The general town-site law (chap. 8, Title XXXII, R. S.) does not apply to these lands. The homesteader can not sell any of his land until he has proved up his homestead claim, and he can not prove up, under any circumstances, in less than fourteen months, by commuting his entry, and without commuting it takes five years; and it generally takes from six months to two years after final proof is made before the same can be approved by the General Land Office and patent issue.

This bill extends the provisions of the general town-site law to these reservations. Under the provisions of this law the land desired to be used for town a site is platted into lots under the supervision and direction of the Interior Department and sold at public auction at not less than $10 per lot.

Under the original agreement with the Indians, as embraced in the Nelson law, the Indians are entitled to all the proceeds of the sale of the land and timber on these reservations.

This bill will not only be of great benefit to the people who want to start towns and engage in business on said ceded lands by enabling them to immediately get title from the Government of the United States to the lots upon which they desire to make improvements, but it will also be of great benefit to the Indians, as they will realize more from the land if it is platted into town lots and sold at public auction under the provisions of the general town-site law than they will get under the homestead law, viz, $1.25 per acre.

It is urgently necessary for the development of these ceded reservations that this bill be passed, so that people who desire to start towns and engage in business along the railroads that are built or are under construction through these lands can get a good and valid title to town lots without waiting from two to six years for the homesteader to get title under the homestead law. The general town-site law provides for an equitable disposition of such portions of the public domain as are suitable for town sites, and in the opinion of your committee this bill should pass.

The salient points of the general town-site law are as follows:

"1. Parties having founded or who desire to found a city or town on the public lands, under the provisions of sections 2382, 2383, 2384, 2385, and 2386, must file with the recorder of the county in which the land is situate a plat thereof, describing the exterior boundaries of the land according to the lines of public surveys, where such surveys have been made.

"2. Such plat must state the name of the city or town, exhibit the streets, squares, blocks, lots, and alleys, and specify the size of the same, with measurements and area of each municipal subdivision, the lots in which shall not exceed 4,200 square feet, with a statement of the extent and general character of the improvements.

"3. The plat and statement must be verified by the oath of the party acting for and in behalf of the occupants and inhabitants of the town or city.

"4. Within one month after filing the plat with the recorder of the county a verified copy of said plat and statement must be sent to the General Land Office, accompanied by the testimony of two witnesses that such town or city has been established in good faith.

"5. Where the city or town is within the limits of an organized land district a similar map and statement must be filed with the register and receiver. The exterior boundary lines of the town, if upon the land over which Government surveys have not been extended, may, when such surveys are so extended, be adjusted according to those lines, where it can be done without impairing vested rights.

"6. In case the parties interested shall fail or refuse, within twelve months after founding a city or town, to file in the General Land Office a transcript map, with the statement and testimony called for by section 2382, the Secretary of the Interior may cause a survey and plat to be made of said city or town, and thereafter the lots will be sold at an increase of 50 per cent on the minimum price of $10 per lot.

"7. When lots vary in size from the limitation fixed in section 2382 (4,200 square feet), and the lots, buildings, and improvements cover an area greater than 640 acres, such variance as to size of lots or excess in area will prove no bar to entry, but the price of the lots may be increased to such reasonable amount as the Secretary may by rule establish."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask what committee reported this bill.

Mr. EDDY. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on the Public Lands. It has also been unanimously reported by a committee of the Senate and passed the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is this the Senate bill?

Mr. EDDY. It is.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. FRANCIS RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 16573) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the St. Francis River, at or near the town of St. Francis, Ark., without amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby granted, and consent is hereby given, for the building of a wagon and foot bridge across St. Francis River at or near the town of St. Francis, in the State of Arkansas, by A. R. Vanmatre, a citizen of the State of Missouri: Provided, That the plans for such bridge shall first be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That said bridge shall be a lawful structure, and shall be known and recognized as a post route, and shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post roads of the United States; and no charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States. Equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal telegraph and telephone purposes; and any changes in said bridge which the Secretary of War may require in the interests of navigation shall be made by the person or corporation owning or operating the same at their own expense.

SEC. 3. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized shall not be commenced within one year and completed within two years from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS RAINY RIVER, IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the rules be suspended and pass the bill (S. 6446) to provide for the construction of a bridge across Rainy River, in Minnesota, without amendment.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

DEDICATION OF CERTAIN PROPERTY TO COLUMBUS, OHIO.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate joint resolution 156, dedicating to the city of Columbus, in the State of Ohio, for uses and purposes of the public streets, part of property conveyed to the United States by Robert Neil by deed dated February 17, 1863, recorded in deed book 76, page 572, etc., Franklin County records.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be, and hereby is, dedicated to the city of Columbus, Franklin County, Ohio, for the uses and purposes of public streets and highways forever, so much of the property conveyed to the United States by Robert Neil by deed dated February 17, A. D. 1863, and recorded in deed book No. 76, at page No. 572, of said Franklin County's record of deeds as is described as follows: Being part of the streets bounding the 77 acres 3 rods and 8 poles of land known as the Columbus Barracks, situate in the city of Columbus, Ohio, said dedication being more specifically described as follows: Being the United States' part of Buckingham street, 77 feet wide; Cleveland avenue, 66 feet wide; Stanton street, 70 feet wide; and Jefferson avenue, 66 feet wide.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to execute such paper writing as will carry out the purposes of this resolution.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS CONECUH RIVER, ALABAMA.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 16915), as amended by the committee, authorizing the commissioners' court of Escambia County, Ala., to construct a bridge across Conecuh River at or near a point known as McGowans Ferry, in said county and State.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

STATE SCHOOL INDEMNITY SELECTION IN ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 5505) adjusting certain conflicts respecting State school indemnity selections in lieu of school sections in abandoned military reservations, without amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all State school indemnity selections in lieu of what are known as school sections in abandoned military reservations made pursuant to the decision of the Secretary of the Interior dated January 28, 1898, and before notice of the withdrawal of that decision was received at the local land office at which the selections were made, and which are otherwise regular and free from any prior lawful claim, shall be confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior; and the lands in such school sections in lieu of which such confirmed selections were made shall be disposed of under the laws applicable to other lands in such abandoned military reservations, a preference right being accorded to those who have made and maintained a bona fide settlement or entry pursuant to said decision of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. LACEY. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced in the House and the Senate at the request of the Department of the Interior in order to relieve the situation growing out of a change in ruling. The Department first held that land sections 36 and 16 inside the military reservation formed a proper basis for indemnity selection. Subsequently it was held that the land belonged to the State for school purposes in place. During this period some land that had thus been disposed of by indemnity was settled upon, making a conflict between the settlers on the one hand and the indemnity selections on the other. While the law was thus held, all selections will be ratified and approved by this bill. This is to relieve the situation of the conflict between the indemnity and the settlers during that brief period.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it would be an unsafe precedent for Congress to undertake to correct all the errors the Secretary of the Interior has made in his rulings?

Mr. LACEY. I think it would be unsafe, both for legislative action and departmental action, but here is a simple proposition covering a few years of time in which we find settlers, on the one hand, and the State, on the other, in conflict. It neither increases nor reduces the amount of the State land; it simply changes the location of it, that is all. The State has obtained other lands in lieu of those it formerly held, and which the settlers have taken, whereas the State ought to have kept the land it had instead of taking new land.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does this apply simply for the benefit of bona fide settlers who have gone on the land and settled it for homestead purposes?

Mr. LACEY. That is all; it relieves the settlers and does not deprive the State of any rights. The Department has submitted a bill through the Speaker to this House, and through the President of the Senate to the other House, asking this relief. The Senate bill having gone through, we now desire to substitute it for the House bill and pass it.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am satisfied.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

BRIDGE OVER PEARL RIVER, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. McLAIN. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 16509, with the amendments reported by the committee.

The bill (H. R. 16509) to authorize the Pearl and Leaf Rivers Railroad Company to bridge Pearl River, in the State of Mississippi, was read, with the amendments proposed by the committee.

The question being taken, the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, with the amendments, was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

ROCHFORD CEMETERY ASSOCIATION, SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass, with an amendment of the Committee on Public Lands, the bill (H. R. 12952) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to the Rochford Cemetery Association to certain lands for cemetery purposes.

The bill, with the amendments, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent to the Rochford Cemetery Association, of the town of Rochford, S. Dak., for cemetery purposes, to the following-described land, to wit: The south half of the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 22, and the north half of the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 27, township 2 north, range 3 east, Black Hills meridian, embracing in all 40 acres of land, in Pennington County, S. Dak., said patent to contain the provision that said land shall be used for cemetery purposes only: Provided, That the said association pay $1.25 per acre therefor.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] to control the time in support of the motion, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] in opposition.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, the town of Rochford, in Pennington County, S. Dak., has used a piece of Government land for cemetery purposes for nearly a quarter of a century. Rochford is an unincorporated village. Very recently some of the older citizens of the town have formed a cemetery association, which has been incorporated under the laws of the State for the purpose of acquiring this piece of land—40 acres—paying for it to the Government, and beautifying and preserving the cemetery.

The provisions of the bill are simply that the Secretary of the Interior may convey by patent to this Rochford Cemetery Association this 40 acres of land, to be used for cemetery purposes only, on the payment of the usual price of $1.25 per acre. The bill provides for nothing else. It is recommended by the Committee on the Public Lands, and by all who have passed upon the question.

The question being taken, the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

LAND FOR RESEVOIR AND WATER PURPOSES, MONTROSE, CAL.

Mr. BELL. I move to suspend the rules and pass, with the amendment reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, the bill (H. R. 16731) permitting the town of Montrose, Colo., to enter 160 acres of land for reservoir and water purposes.

The bill with the proposed amendment was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the town of Montrose, in the State of Colorado, is hereby authorized to enter and receive patent for the lands hereinafter described, by and in the name of the mayor of said town, and in trust for it, for reservoir and water purposes, upon its paying $1.25 per acre therefor, namely: Beginning at a point 1¼ miles north and 3 miles west of the quarter section corner on the west line of section 18, township 48 north, range 6 west, of the New Mexico principal meridian; thence north 2,640 feet; thence west 2,640 feet; thence south 2,640 feet; thence east 2,640 feet to the place of beginning, and containing 160 acres of unsurveyed, nonmineral mountain land, which should, if the Government survey was extended to said locality, constitute the south half of the northeast quarter and the north half of the southeast quarter of section 4, township 48 north, range 7 west, New Mexico principal meridian, in Montrose County, State of Colorado: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair any existing valid adverse rights to any portion of said land.

The question being taken, the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

FOG BELL, ETC., ON SOUTHAMPTON SHOAL, SAN FRANCISCO BAY.

Mr. KAHN. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 2450) to establish a fog bell and lens-lantern light on the southeastern end of Southampton Shoal, San Francisco Bay, California.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be established on the southeastern end of Southampton Shoal, San Francisco Bay, California, a fog bell and lens-lantern light, at a cost not to exceed $30,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, Southampton Shoal lies in the middle of San Francisco Bay, and is about 2½ miles long by a third of a mile wide. Between it and Angel Island is the strait through which all vessels bound for our great rivers, the San Joaquin and the Sacramento, and the San Pablo and Suisun bays, must sail. There is probably no place on the entire Pacific coast where so many vessels pass except through the Golden Gate itself. Recently a ship known as the Malsden was wrecked on that shoal. The Department strongly recommends the passage of this bill. The committee is unanimous in reporting it favorably.

The large number of vessels constantly passing this shoal, going to Port Costa and river ports to load with grain and other products, together with the danger by reason of the fogs so frequent in that neighborhood and the strong tides that run there, make it necessary that this light should be established. Under present conditions this shoal is a great menace to navigation. Several vessels have met disaster there, and the construction of this lighthouse is intended to prevent such accidents in the future. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 7648) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River and to establish it as a post road, with amendments.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill with amendments.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the bill as amended was passed.

EXTRADITION TO AND FROM THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 7124) to provide for the removal of persons accused of crime, to and from the Philippine Islands, for trial.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to that request, I would ask the gentleman if this bill has been considered by the Committee of the House on Insular Affairs?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The bill has not been considered by the House committee. I submitted it to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX], a member of the committee, and he said he could see no ground for objection to it. It passed the Senate last Saturday. The bill originated in the Department of Justice, was drawn by the Solicitor-General at the request of the Secretary of War, by whom it was sent here. It simply provides that persons committing crime, or charged with crime in the Philippine Islands and escaping to one of the Territories or States of the Union may be extradited, and the reverse of that, that persons committing crime here and escaping to the Philippine Islands may be brought back. There is no law now which provides for that extradition.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill ought to be considered by the committee. I object to having a second considered as ordered. We have not a copy of the bill and I want some further explanation.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to a second being considered as ordered. The Chair would ask if the gentleman's motion is to pass the Senate bill as it passed the Senate?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As it passed the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Then, this other bill will have to be read, as the one which was read is not the same. The Clerk will report the bill as it passed the Senate.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

During the reading,

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, that is not the way the bill passed the Senate. Manua was stricken out. It applies only to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this shows the necessity of having the bill considered by the committee.

The SPEAKER. We have here a certified copy of the bill and that is what the Clerk is reading from.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That being so, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to have the reference to the committee. I received the bill from the Senator from Massachusetts, who told me that was the way it passed the Senate, and I made this motion at his request.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair understands that the gentleman withdraws his motion.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; I withdraw my motion.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 1563) for the relief of William H. Crawford.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, William H. Crawford, of Philadelphia, Pa., an assistant engineer, with rank of lieutenant, junior grade, on the retired list of the Navy, as for disabilities incurred in the line of duty, to take effect upon the date of appointment under this act.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if this bill has been reported by the committee of the House?

Mr. ADAMS. This bill has been reported by the Naval Committee, I believe, unanimously.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will not object to having a second considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. There is no objection. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the House that this bill is to correct a mistake made by the Secretary of the Navy some years ago, in which an officer, after gallant service in the Army, having been wounded twice, upon recovery, was appointed an assistant engineer in the Navy, where he continued to serve during the balance of the war until injured by escaping steam. His health finally failed him, and he was ordered by a physician to go out to Colorado.

Knowing that probably the long absence required in order to effect a cure could not be obtained from the Department, he wrote a letter on the 1st of April, asking if his resignation would be accepted. To his surprise the Secretary of the Navy treated this inquiry as a resignation, and answered it on the 6th, saying that his resignation was accepted. Immediately, on the 9th, he wrote a letter saying there was a mistake—that it was simply an inquiry in order that he might control his conduct in regard to going to Colorado for his health, if it should be necessary; but he was informed that it was too late—that the resignation must stand. He continued to appeal to the Department to have this mistake rectified, until finally the Secretary of the Navy said it was beyond the power of the Department so to do, and referred him to Congress.

Under these conditions he has come to Congress with the sanction of the Secretary of the Navy. The bill has passed the Senate committee, it has passed the Senate, and has passed the House Committee on Naval Affairs. Now it comes before the House for passage in this body. It is a most meritorious case.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. Is not this a bill that was voted down during the present session of Congress?

Mr. ADAMS. No, sir; this bill has not been voted down this session. I assure the gentleman.

Mr. STEELE. Was it not up for consideration?

Mr. ADAMS. It was up on a request for unanimous consent, and was objected to.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do I understand the gentleman that this man comes in that class of those who resigned from the Navy at one time?

Mr. ADAMS. Why, sir, he did not resign.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am asking the question. I want to find out.

Mr. ADAMS. That is the merit of this bill. He wrote a letter of inquiry if his resignation would be accepted, and the reason for that inquiry was that he was threatened with consumption and his physician said that probably he would have to go to Colorado for a long residence; that he probably could not live in this climate longer. He made this inquiry to know, if he had to go, if this long absence for his health became necessary, whether his resignation would be accepted. To his surprise, this inquiry was treated and accepted as a resignation. He at once protested and has been protesting ever since.

Mr. BARTLETT. In other words, they accepted his inquiry whether he would have to resign as a resignation, and he is no longer on the rolls.

Mr. ADAMS. I will read the letter to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Read the letter.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am just trying to find out the facts.

Mr. ADAMS. I am sure if the gentleman understands the facts he will help to right this wrong.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will, if it is right to do so.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman must understand that a naval officer in bad health has to report from time to time during his leave of absence. He wrote the following letter:

PHILADELPHIA, April 1, 1868.

SIR: I beg to inform the Department that my health has not been so good in the past fifteen days as when I last reported, and feeling convinced that it is permanently impaired to an extent sufficient to disqualify me from performing my duty, I respectfully ask if my resignation will be accepted if tendered at the end of the present month.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. H. CRAWFORD,
Second Assistant Engineer, U. S. Navy, 1328 Mount Vernon Street.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary United States Navy, Washington, D. C.

On the 6th of the month the Secretary of the Navy wrote as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, April 6, 1868.

SIR: Your resignation as a second assistant engineer in the United States Navy, tendered in your letter of the 1st instant, is hereby accepted, to take effect on the 30th instant.

Respectfully,

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

Second Assistant Engineer WM. H. CRAWFORD,
Philadelphia.

To that he made the following reply:

Immediately upon receipt of the above letter Mr. Crawford wrote the Secretary, saying:

"PHILADELPHIA, April 9, 1868.

"SIR: Your letter of the 6th instant is received. I respectfully beg leave to state that I have not tendered you my resignation. I wrote to know if it would be accepted if tendered. My object in doing this is because my physician has advised me to go to the Rocky Mountains for my health, and if my health does not improve soon I thought of doing so, and in that case I wish to know if it will be accepted if tendered.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"W. H. CRAWFORD,
"Second Assistant Engineer, U. S. Navy,
"No. 1328 Mount Vernon Street.

"Hon. GIDEON WELLES,
"Secretary U. S. Navy, Washington, D. C."

Mr. BARTLETT. What was the date of that letter inquiring whether his resignation would be accepted?

Mr. ADAMS. April 1, 1868.

Mr. BARTLETT. What has this officer been doing now for thirty-four years?

Mr. ADAMS. He has been importuning the Navy Department to correct this error. So far as he was informed, the entire power lay with the Secretary of the Navy to rescind the acceptance of that resignation. When Secretary Long informed him that it was beyond the power of the Secretary of the Navy to rescind that resignation, and referred him to Congress, he came here at once. The matter now stands with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, with the indorsement of the Senate committee, the passage of the bill through the Senate, the passage of the bill through the House Naval Committee, and it is now before the House for ratification.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman notice that the letter was written on April 1.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; and that is the reason he was made a fool of.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I inquire of the gentleman, when he first undertook to correct this mistake or error, which was committed by the Navy Department, to which he has referred?

Mr. ADAMS. Three days afterwards. I have just read the letter to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that. When he undertook to correct it at the Navy Department, what did he do after that in order to get the Department to restore him to his place?

Mr. ADAMS. I will state to the gentleman that here is the affidavit of Lieutenant Crawford——

Mr. BARTLETT. Of course I accept the gentleman's statement as to that.

Mr. ADAMS. I will read the affidavit:

From April 9, 1868, until Secretary Long decided, in 1899, that the Department had not power to correct, etc.

And so this paper goes on to state that in order to support himself that he was obliged to take private occupation, which took him out of the country off and on, but that he never ceased to importune the Department to correct the mistake which the Department had made. It is not a case similar to that of the other officers who went on and resigned. He never resigned and never intended to resign.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it has taken the Navy Department from 1868 to 1899, with all its incoming and outgoing Secretaries and other officials, to determine whether this man had properly resigned or not?

Mr. ADAMS. It took them that time, after all his repeated efforts, while it was understood that the Secretary had the power to correct the error, before Secretary Long said that it was necessary for him to come to Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do you mean to say that there was no one in the Navy Department in this thirty years who was able to tell this man that they had no power and that he should come to Congress for relief.

Mr. ADAMS. I mean to say that no Secretary took that position until Secretary Long took it and referred him to Congress. That is the record.

Mr. BARTLETT. And the gentleman says this officer has been absent from the country engaged in some business?

Mr. ADAMS. Off and on. He had to support his family.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why, certainly; and he ought to have done it.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to have a little time upon this bill without taking the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee controls the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. STEELE. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not this officer send a feeler to the Navy Department to see if it would not give him some more leave of absence or accept his resignation? I will ask him if it is not a fact that he had been deviling the Department for nearly a year before that, without having performed any service, getting a leave of absence and asking for an extension and saying will not the Department or will the Department, at a certain time next year, say, that, on account of my inability to perform service, accept my resignation, and in obedience to that the Secretary of the Navy accepted his resignation? Is it not a case where the Secretary himself gave the benefit of the doubt to the service and got rid of him?

Mr. ADAMS. I am surprised at the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. STEELE. Well, answer the question. I do not want your surprise.

Mr. ADAMS (continuing). With his record as a soldier, to bring up such a suggestion against a man whose health has been impaired in the service of the country. He was wounded at Fair Oaks and was at Antietam. Then afterwards he went into the Navy, and was scalded by escaping steam so as to affect his health.

Mr. STEELE. I am asking for information.

Mr. ADAMS. The remarks of the gentleman should rise above that. The man was in ill health.

Mr. STEELE. And has been ever since the war.

Mr. ADAMS. And has been.

Mr. STEELE. He has never performed any duty since the close of the war. Then he threatened to resign, and the Secretary just accepted the bluff. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMS. Not at all. I have explained the circumstances fully; that he felt that he was compelled to go to Colorado for his health.

Mr. STEELE. What does the Secretary of the Navy say about it?

Mr. ADAMS. Secretary Long?

Mr. STEELE. Secretary Welles; and after Secretary Welles had called the bluff, as my friend on the other side suggests, who knows the game better than I do—when he called the bluff and had accepted his resignation, how is it we had no Secretary who came to Congress and asked power to correct the mistake, if it was one, and if he did not say so, why did not the next Secretary say so, or any other in the last twenty-five years have anything to say of the kind? No Secretary has said so until Secretary Long said what he is reported to.

Mr. ADAMS. I will state in reply to the gentleman that shortly after the war the officers of the Navy were in excess of those required for the public service, and they were seizing every chance to accept resignations or supposed resignations in retiring them and getting them off the list. That is one reason why this inquiry was taken and accepted as a resignation when a resignation never was intended.

Mr. STEELE. What I want to know is this: If the gentleman believes that this officer had been a desirable officer and the Secretary had made a little mistake, if he would not have corrected it in ten days, much less thirty years?

Mr. ADAMS. Why, the gentleman forgets that I read the letter of Lieutenant Crawford, which he wrote to the Department after they had accepted his letter as a resignation on the 6th, he wrote them on the 9th.

Mr. STEELE. That was just after his bluff had been called. He felt badly about it.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not consider, sir, that a resignation of an officer of the United States Navy is to be called and made fun of by the term of "bluff" in the House of Representatives.

Mr. STEELE. There may be something objectionable to the word "bluff."

Mr. ADAMS. There is when you apply it to the honorable resignation of an officer of the United States Navy.

Mr. STEELE. I have had my bluffs called. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. You can not call mine on this subject. [Laughter.] If you do you will be beaten by the House of Representatives.

Mr. STEELE. Well, that is all right. I understand the case from the gentleman's point of view, but my opinion is that my surmise is correct, that if he had been a desirable officer he would have been in the Navy to-day.

Mr. ADAMS. I say, Mr. Speaker, that he was a desirable officer. I have explained that at that particular time the officer was in the United States service.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to ask if the gentleman is speaking in his own time or in mine?

Mr. ADAMS. I am speaking in the time of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. STEELE. I have just taken my seat, and I am glad the gentleman has finished his remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad if the gentleman from Pennsylvania would have read again the letter of resignation in my time.

Mr. ADAMS. Let the Clerk read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, April 1, 1868.

SIR: I beg to inform the Department that my health has not been so good in the past fifteen days as when I last reported, and feeling convinced that it is permanently impaired to an extent sufficient to disqualify me from performing my duty, I respectfully ask if my resignation will be accepted if tendered at the end of the present month.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. H. CRAWFORD,
Second Assistant Engineer, U. S. Navy, 1338 Mount Vernon Street.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary U. S. Navy, Washington, D. C.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, we have set an example to-day—and I refer to this case so that I may be in a proper position—of overruling the War Department and the Navy Department in many of their acts which have stood uncontested for from thirty to thirty-five years. I do not undertake to decide what ought to be done about this, but one thing is very certain, we have a most incompetent and unworthy organization of the Navy and the Army, or we have come to a degree of interference by Congress that is not justified.

I will not comment upon other bills which have been passed. We passed a bill that worked its way somehow or other from the Military Committee conferring an office, a status upon a sergeant of the war who failed to acquire a commission. There were many thousands of them. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs told me to-day that he did not doubt that there were 3,000 of them standing in the same position, good men, but not officers.

Now, here is a case of a man who notified the Department thirty-odd years ago that he was not fit to be in the naval service, and the Department accepted his proposition, and he went out. Now, times got hard, his health is now not what he thought it was then, and he comes back to be restored to the Navy. Have we got an arm of the service so utterly inefficient that it can not do business better than that, or are we to load the retired list of the Army and Navy simply because somebody is a good man, and somebody made a mistake in going out of the Navy, and now after a long lapse of years wants to be put back?

I do not believe in it; and I will take my chances of the criticism by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this is a good soldier.

I do not doubt it. He is contented with his record, and so am I. He eulogizes him here in Congress; so would I if I knew him. But I can bring here 100 cases, in two hours' time, just as meritorious as that one. The question is now are we to proceed and establish the precedent that all a man has got to do is to come here and say he made a mistake and regrets it and we restore him to the service?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he considers the letter a resignation?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do. Acquiescence, as the gentleman knows, for he is a lawyer, in a construction of that character is just as good as if it had been in the most positive terms.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does not the gentleman recognize that in three days after it had been so construed the officer himself gave the other construction to it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. He did not give a very effective construction to it.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, the mistake the gentleman from Ohio makes is one of principle. I would have some sympathy with his remarks if he said that this House ought not to overturn the judgment of the Department and reinstate an officer who had resigned of his own volition. That position would have been sound and well taken; but that is not this case. This man did not resign. He did not acquiesce in the construction of his letter. It was a wrong construction, which he asks you to right. Immediately upon receiving the acceptance of his alleged resignation, dated the 6th, at once, on the 9th, he writes and says, "I did not resign. That was never intended to be a resignation."

We are not overriding the judgment of the Department. There is no such purpose proposed in this bill. Those who take that view do not understand the situation. The matter is simply this: The Department admits that the mistake was made in the interpretation of this man's letter, and the Department says: "We can not correct our own mistake; you must go to Congress." In pursuance of the direction of the Secretary of the Navy this man comes to Congress; and this bill is brought before the House for the purpose of correcting the mistake admitted by the Department, but which it states it has no power to correct.

That is the position. There is no reversal of the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy; there is no reversal of the advice and judgment of the Department. The object is simply to correct an error.

Mr. STEELE. Was not this bill voted down at the last session?

Mr. ADAMS. Not within my knowledge.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not want the gentleman from Pennsylvania to understand me as construing this man's letter as a resignation. I think it was not.

Mr. ADAMS. It was not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If this man did not intend to resign at the end of the month, why did he want the opinion of the Department as to whether his resignation would be accepted?

Mr. ADAMS. Simply because he was in ill health—was threatened with consumption—and had been advised by his physician that to effect a permanent cure he would probably have to go to Colorado for the period of a year or more. He had the matter under consideration, and he asked the Department whether, if he decided that he must be absent from duty for this long period (for which he could not get leave of absence), the Department would accept his resignation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In that letter he states that his health was impaired and that he would be unable to perform any of the duties of his position.

Mr. ADAMS. As I have stated, every officer who is absent on sick leave is obliged to make a report to the Department every fifteen days as to the state of his health, and the letter to which the gentleman refers was written partly in compliance with the regulation of the Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did he want the Department to inform him that it would not accept his resignation if it should be sent in?

Mr. ADAMS. No; he wished to know whether, if his resignation should be tendered at the end of the month, it would be accepted. The letter so states.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He desired to send in his resignation at the end of the month?

Mr. ADAMS. He did not know as to that. He was awaiting the decision of his physician as to whether he would be obliged to go away for a long period in order to cure permanently his threatened pulmonary trouble.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill,

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds have failed to vote in favor of the motion, and it is not agreed to.

TRANSFER OF LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 5212) granting to the State of California 640 acres of land in lieu of section 16, township 7 south, range 8 east, San Bernardino meridian, State of California, now occupied by the Torros band or village of Mission Indians.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of California 640 acres of lands, to be selected by said State, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, from any of the unappropriated public lands of nonmineral character in said State, in lieu of section 16, township 7 south, range 8 east, San Bernardino meridian, State of California; and the selection by said State of the lands hereby granted, upon the approval of same by the Secretary of the Interior, shall operate as a waiver by the State of its right to said section 16, and thereupon said section 16 shall become a part of the reservation heretofore set apart for the use and occupancy of the Torros band or village of Mission Indians, of southern California, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved January 12, 1891, entitled "An act for the relief of the Mission Indians in the State of California," according to the terms and subject to the conditions imposed by said act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded on this motion?

Mr. MOON. A second is demanded.

Mr. NEEDHAM. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, under the general law there were granted to the State of California sections 16 and 36 for school purposes. It has been found that section 16 described in the bill is occupied by the Torros Band of Mission Indians, who have made valuable improvements upon it, including some artesian wells and other property of that kind. This bill provides that the State of California may select, in lieu of the lands now so occupied, another 640 acres. The bill was prepared by the Department, it has passed the Senate, and has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. NEEDHAM to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

WIDOWS ISLAND, MAINE.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 3100) providing for the conveyance of Widows Island, Maine, to the State of Maine.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to convey, for and in behalf of the United States, to the State of Maine, when said State shall decide to accept the same, to be used for public purposes, Widows Island, situated in Fox Island thoroughfare, on the coast of Maine, with all of the buildings and improvements thereon: Provided, That whenever, in the judgment of the President of the United States, the building and grounds herein ceded to the State of Maine are needed by the Navy Department, the United States may resume possession of the same: And provided further, That should the United States resume possession of said building and grounds the value of any improvements made by the State of Maine shall be refunded to the State of Maine, and that the Secretary of the Navy shall ascertain and fix the value of said improvements, if any there be: Provided further, That if the State of Maine shall at any time cease or fail to use the aforesaid property for public purposes it shall immediately revert to the United States, and in that case no compensation shall be made by the United States for any improvements or betterments.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I demand a second on this motion.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I ask whether this bill has been reported by any committee of this House?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes, sir; it has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs at this session, the report having been made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not object to a second being ordered.

There being no objection, the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I should like to hear some reason in favor of the bill. I should be glad to know the value of this island.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think that if the Clerk will read the report it will be found to make a clear statement of the whole situation. After the reading, if any gentleman so desires, I will make a further explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report in the time of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD].

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3100) providing for the conveyance of Widows Island, Maine, to the State of Maine, beg leave to submit the following report:

Widows Island, which is authorized to be conveyed by this bill to the State of Maine, is situated on the coast of Maine. It was purchased by the Light-House Board in 1857, of private individuals, for the sum of $500. In 1887 a naval hospital was constructed thereon, at an expense of $50,000, for the purposes and under the circumstances set forth in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, containing the report of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery approving the bill, which is now quoted:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 16, 1901.

SIR: Referring to bill H. R. 12001, providing for the conveyance of Widows Island, Maine, to the State of Maine, and to your request of the 11th instant for an expression of the Department's views in regard thereto, I have the honor to state that the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, which has charge of the property in question, reports as follows:

"The naval hospital on Widows Island, Maine, was built in 1887. It is a two-story building, 50 by 69 feet. It will accommodate about 30 patients. It was intended principally as an administration building, and a majority of the patients were to be accommodated in outside pavilions.

"The hospital was built to meet an emergency which no longer exists. The Navy Department had a small yellow-fever hospital on Woods Island, near Portsmouth, but local influences necessitated its abandonment, and it became immediately necessary to provide other accommodations for possible yellow-fever cases that could not then be cared for elsewhere.

"In consequence of wise and effective sanitary precautions the vessels of the Navy cruising in the West Indies have been free from yellow fever for several years. Meanwhile, the health authorities of the State of New York have established in the lower bay, inside of Sandy Hook, very extensive and very complete contagious-disease hospitals, where every attention can be given to the officers and crews of infected vessels and the vessels thoroughly disinfected. In the event of yellow fever appearing on any vessel of the Navy it would be immediately sent to the New York quarantine station, which is now thoroughly well equipped for service.

"This renders the Widows Island Hospital unnecessary as a yellow-fever hospital, for which it was built, and it is not required for a general hospital. There is a naval hospital at Portsmouth, N. H., which meets all requirements of the station.

"The Widows Island Hospital has been a source of expense to the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery for many years, as it was necessary to keep it in repair and have it properly guarded. It was not needed during the war with Spain, and it is altogether improbable that it would ever be needed by the Navy or be anything else than a continued expense. The Bureau, therefore, entirely approves of H. R. 1201 and recommends its approval by the Department."

This property having ceased to be of service to the Navy, so far as this Department is concerned, no objection is perceived to the passage of the measure above mentioned ceding it to the State of Maine.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

HON. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

Since this hospital was built in 1887, for the reasons, presumably, indicated in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, it has never been occupied by a single patient. Its only occupant has been the keeper, who has had charge of the property for the Government, without having been of any use to the Government. Since its erection it has been a constant source of expense, the items for the last four years being as follows:

1897—Keeper	$720.00
Miscellaneous expenses	207.99
Total	927.99
1898—Keeper	720.00
Miscellaneous expenses	65.00
Total	785.00
1899—Keeper	720.00
Miscellaneous expenses	72.33
Repairs to roof	30.00
Total	822.33
1900—Keeper	720.00
Miscellaneous expenses	183.75
Wharf	650.00
Total	1,553.75

We are of the opinion that there is no reasonable probability of its use by the Government; and if it is to be kept by the Government and kept in proper condition, it will involve an annual outlay of from $720 to $1,000 or more. Under the circumstances we recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I could not catch the condition on which the Government of the United States can resume this title. I understood there was some such condition in the bill.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes. I will read it:

Provided, That whenever, in the judgment of the President of the United States, the building and grounds herein ceded to the State of Maine are needed by the Navy Department, the United States may resume possession of the same: And provided further, That should the United States resume possession of said building and grounds the value of any improvements made by the State of Maine shall be refunded to the State of Maine, and that the Secretary of the Navy shall ascertain and fix the value of said improvements, if any there be: Provided further, That if the State of Maine shall at any time cease or fail to use the aforesaid property for public purposes it shall immediately revert to the United States, and in that case no compensation shall be made by the United States for any improvements or betterments.

My attention was first called to this, I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee, by Surgeon-General Van Ruypen, about three years ago. I was in his office one day and he called my attention to this island with this hospital upon it. I knew about the island, because it is situated about 15 miles from where I live. He called my attention to the fact that it never had been used, even for a minute, for the purposes for which it was constructed; that it cost the Department on an average about $1,000 a year, and he asked me if I could not arrange to get rid of it and get the State of Maine to take it. I told him that possibly it might be done, so I introduced a bill at the last session, which was unanimously reported by the committee, but I was not able to reach it.

I have seen the building myself during the past summer. The roof is in such condition that extensive repairs will have to be made in order to make it tight. It seems that the original contractors contemplated a continuous leak, because when they built it they built around the chimneys that are in the building wooden troughs for the purpose of catching the leakage, and since then it has had tubs and receptacles of that sort in its attic for that purpose. Unless a large sum of money is expended on the roof, the building itself will be somewhat injured by that leakage. That is about all there is to the bill. At the suggestion of the Surgeon-General I am doing what I can to get rid of this annual expense which does not seem to produce any result to the Government of the United States.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it fair to impose this expense on the State of Maine to keep it in order?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The State of Maine will have to keep it in order if it accepts it. It contemplates using it as a reformatory for women. It is not especially well adapted for that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Badly located?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; it is not very well located for that purpose. I am inclined to think that if the bill passes the State of Maine will probably create a reformatory for women and locate it in this place.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that if a condition were imposed on the State of Maine to pay from $25,000 to $50,000, that the State of Maine would accept it on that condition?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I should doubt it very much. I think it is somewhat doubtful whether the State of Maine will organize its reformatory for women, even under the circumstances, if the building is transferred from the Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I believe the report shows that the Government expended $50,000 on the building.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; it undoubtedly cost $50,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How much land is there?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. There are something like two or three acres on the island. There is nothing else on it except this building and the wharf, and it is absolutely worthless for any other purpose. It is not practicable to use it for any other purpose.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, could we not utilize this occasion for at least one useful purpose, that of trying to find out who is responsible for this expenditure of nearly $100,000 for a piece of property that the Government of the United States has never for one moment used? Somebody is responsible for this kind of crime, and we ought to at least be able to find out who it is and hold him up so that the people can excoriate him, mentally, at least.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have no objection to the gentleman from Iowa holding up anybody or impaling anybody he likes, but I take it he will not bother the gentleman from Maine with that process, because it was before his time. I assume it was built for good reasons. Who was responsible for this in 1887 I do not know.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What appropriation bill carries the annual appropriation for that?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I presume the naval appropriation bill; but as to that I do not know.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Perhaps the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, could tell us.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know anything about the island or the widow. No appropriation bill that I know anything about carries this appropriation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman recognize that it would be impossible to get the $720 appropriated annually, which I understood the gentleman from Maine to say had been appropriated, unless Congress made the appropriation? And if Congress made the appropriation, I thought it was a respectful question to address to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, because I know he knows what the items are which are recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I have no doubt that the maintenance of hospitals is paid from appropriations carried by the naval appropriation bill, and not from any carried on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Maine if he is personally well acquainted with this island and these premises?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I can not say that I am well acquainted. I was on the island during the last summer, and at this building, and made a call on the keeper.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What sort of a place would it be for a lobster hatchery? [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not think the gentleman from Ohio can hatch out any lobster idea from this island.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We have had some trouble to give the State of Maine a lobster hatchery.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I know you did, and you exercised a great deal of discretion in so doing, which it affords me great pleasure to now acknowledge.

Mr. CANNON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. This is on the seacoast?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is in Fox Island Thoroughfare, in Penobscot Bay.

Mr. CANNON. There come in, especially from Portland and New York Harbor, and generally from New York, claims for damages, scores of them, for the breaking of windows and the doing of damage by the discharge of the high-power guns in our seacoast defenses. Are there any of them near there that would jar out any of these windows?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have not discovered anything larger than a fowling piece.

Mr. CANNON. Nothing larger?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No.

Mr. CANNON. There are no high-power guns near there?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No, except in Portland, and that is about 60 miles distant. I do not understand that the shock would travel that distance.

Mr. CANNON. For many years there has been an agonizing effort to have the Government buy certain lands upon Cushings Island.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have nothing to do with that.

Mr. CANNON. I just wanted to ask my friend a question. The lands are very expensive, and very extensive also. Does my friend think that a trade might be gotten up in some way by which we could get Cushings Island?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not think any Siamese twinship could be found between Cushings Island and Widows Island. I am pretty well advised as to what the chairman of the committee has in his mind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. With pleasure.

Mr. FITZGERALD. During the reading of the report it was stated that there were accommodations in the harbor of New York for these yellow-fever cases. Is it the intention to make New York Harbor a dumping ground for the yellow-fever cases formerly sent to this island?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If that were the intention, it need not disturb New York very much, when fifteen years have elapsed without a single case in that hospital. I do not think my friend need be disturbed very much about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There must have been some possibility of a number of cases from the Navy being sent to this hospital, when such an extensive plant was erected.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I know nothing about what gave rise to the erection of this building, or what were the reasons for building it. I suppose the Department expected to have some use for it, but it turns out to be a fact that they have not had.

One of the reasons given by the Surgeon-General in conversation was substantially the reason given here—that after it was built other accommodations, as I remember it, were made in New York, which more adequately took care of their yellow-fever patients, and rendered this unnecessary. Of course I do not know anything about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The accommodations made in the harbor of New York were made by the local authorities for the protection of the people of New York. It is not a place to which the Navy can send its cases. It is a place where vessels coming to the port of New York with persons infected by contagious diseases may send them until they have recovered; and if the object of the bill is to make this contageous-disease station in New York Harbor a dumping ground for the entire Navy, it is my opinion that this hospital in Maine should remain the property of the Government.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, I will say to my friend from New York, that I do not think there is any such purpose or intent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should hope not, because we are quite solicitous about our health up there.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not think that consideration is involved in it at all.

The question was taken; and two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill passed.

NATIONAL-BANK RESERVES.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7659) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to amend sections 5191 and 5192 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes," to report it with amendments, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Finance were, on page 1, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "thirty;" on page 2, line 3, after the word "Comptroller," to strike out the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury;" in line 5, after the word "city," to strike out the words "so designated," and in line 10, after the word "Statutes," to strike out the proviso in the following words:

Provided, That no bank with a capital of less than $100,000 shall be thus designated.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act entitled "An act to amend sections 5191 and 5192 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That whenever three-fourths in number of the national banks located in any city of the United States having a population of 30,000 people shall make application to the Comptroller of the Currency, in writing, asking that the name of the city in which such banks are located shall be added to the cities named in sections 5191 and 5192 of the Revised Statutes, the Comptroller shall have authority to grant such request, and every bank located in such city shall at all times thereafter have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, an amount equal to at least 25 per cent of its deposits, as provided in sections 5191 and 5195 of the Revised Statutes."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the bill is finally disposed of, I desire to say a single word in explanation.

The only object of the bill is to strike out "fifteen thousand" in the sections of the Statutes named and to insert "thirty thousand," so that in cities of 30,000 inhabitants these banks may have reserves. That is the only change. The House fixed it at 15,000 and we insert 30,000. I hope the bill will be passed.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ISSUANCE OF A DUPLICATE CHECK.

Mr. TELLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15747) directing the issue of a check in lieu of a lost check drawn by George A. Bartlett, disbursing clerk, in favor of Fannie T. Sayles, executrix, and others, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill which has just been reported by the Senator from Colorado.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It recites in the preamble that whereas it appears that George A. Bartlett, disbursing clerk, Treasury Department, did, on the 19th of July, 1902, issue a check, No. 1813553, upon the Treasurer of the United States at Washington, District of Columbia, in favor of Fannie T. Sayles, executrix, and others, for $3,708.33, being in payment for rent of a building in Indianapolis, Ind., for quarters for Government offices; and that the check was by Fannie T. Sayles, executrix, and others, indorsed for deposit in the Merchants' National Bank, Indianapolis, Ind., and so deposited, which check was subsequently mailed by the Merchants' National Bank to its correspondent for collection, and was destroyed in a wreck on the Pennsylvania Limited on July 24, 1902, in transmission through the United States mails; and whereas the provisions of the act of February 16, 1885, amending section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing United States disbursing officers and agents to issue duplicates of lost checks, apply only to checks drawn for $2,500 or less, it therefore instructs George A. Bartlett, disbursing clerk of the Treasury Department, to issue a duplicate of the original check, under such regulations in regard to its issue and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of duplicate checks under the provisions of section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if the bill is in the usual form?

Mr. TELLER. It is in the usual form. It is one of those cases where the amount is so large that the Department can not pay it; and therefore an act of Congress is required.

Mr. SPOONER. In bills of this kind there is ordinarily a provision for the filing of a bond of indemnity.

Mr. TELLER. By this bill it is provided that the duplicate check to be issued shall be issued in accordance with the provisions of the statute relating to these matters.

Mr. SPOONER. That is provided for, then?

Mr. TELLER. It is.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

S. Charleston, destroyed on a coral reef off Camiguin Island, in the Philippines, November 2, 1899, for losses incurred by them, respectively, in the destruction of that vessel.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CENTRAL ARIZONA RAILWAY.

Mr. BURTON. I desire unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 6968) granting the Central Arizona Railway Company a right of way for railroad purposes through the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserve, in the Territory of Arizona.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been twice read to the Senate. Is there objection to its consideration?

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if this is the bill which was up the other day?

Mr. BURTON. It is.

Mr. SPOONER. The one which the President vetoed?

Mr. BURTON. No, sir; it is not the bill which the President vetoed; but it is a new bill which I introduced to cover the objection the President had to the former measure.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think we ought to take up a bill——

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator will permit me, I hold in my hand two communications—one from the Secretary of the Interior and the other from the Commissioner of the General Land Office—which I will ask to have read.

Mr. SPOONER. I think it would be better to let the Clerk read the communications rather than that the Senator should hold them in his hand.

Mr. BURTON. I send the communications to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the two communications will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 24, 1903.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS, Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by reference from your committee, with a request for views thereon, of a copy of S. 6968, entitled "A bill granting the Central Arizona Railway Company a right of way for railroad purposes through the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserve, in the Territory of Arizona."

In answer to the request I inclose a copy of the report on the bill by the Assistant Commissioner of the General Land Office, under date of the 23d instant.

He has stated therein that he sees no objection to the passage of the bill, as it appears to provide safeguards necessary for the protection and government of the reserve.

I approve of the report.

Very respectfully, E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1903.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: By the reference of the honorable Acting Secretary of the Interior, dated January 22, 1903, for early report in duplicate, with return of paper, I am in receipt of a copy of Senate bill 6968, granting the Central Arizona Railway Company a right of way for railroad purposes through the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserve, in the Territory of Arizona, which bill was referred by the clerk of the Committee on Public Lands, under instructions of the committee, for the views of the Department thereon.

In reply I have the honor to report that as the bill appears to contain the safeguards which are necessary for the protection and the government of the forest reserve, I see no objection to its passage.

The copy of the bill referred, with a copy of this letter, is herewith inclosed.

Very respectfully,

W. A. RICHARDS,
Assistant Commissioner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment. ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. TURNER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 159) providing for free homesteads on the public lands for actual and bona fide settlers in the north one-half of the Colville Indian Reservation, State of Washington, and reserving the public lands for that purpose. It is only fair that I should state in this connection that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] desires to make a statement concerning this bill, but I am assured that the statement will not be very long and that it will not delay the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks for the present consideration of House bill 159. It has been read in full to the Senate and considered as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a statement about what this bill is and what it involves. I will try to be brief, and to come within the five-minute rule.

There was a Colville Indian Reservation. It contained about 3,000,000 acres. It was made by an Executive order. I do not think there was any treaty with the Indians establishing this reservation. Several years ago an agreement was negotiated with the Indians by which half of the reservation, about fifteen hundred thousand acres, was to be opened to settlement, and the Indians were to be paid, under that agreement, I think, a million and a half dollars. If that is not the sum, the Senator will correct me.

That agreement came here and was not ratified by Congress, but Congress proceeded to direct the reservation to be opened, allotments to be made to the Indians, the balance to be sold at a specified price per acre, and the proceeds to be retained in the Treasury and applied for the use and benefit of the Indians. But there was a provision in the act that the fund should be subject at any time to disposition by Congress. It was not an absolutely permanent fund in the Treasury for the Indians.

This land has been allotted; that is, the allotments which were to be made to the Indians have been made. As it stands now the Government is obliged to sell the lands, and while the fund remains not otherwise disposed of in the Treasury to apply the use of it for the benefit of the Indians.

Now, it is proposed to open these lands to homestead settlement under the free-homes act. I know it is useless in the Senate to object to or oppose such a proposition; my objections have been too often overruled. But I wish to state to the Senate that I believe the result of it will be that the Colville Reservation Indians will come to Congress and ask for $1,500,000 and that Congress will give it to them. I want the Senate to pass the bill with a full understanding of what I believe will hereafter be the result.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator believe that the Government will be under any obligations to give it to them? By the agreement itself the Government had the right to make other disposition of the fund. Would not this be another disposition, and would it not end the whole proceeding?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator knows perfectly well as to that, as he has recently been engaged in the settlement of an Indian claim where it is conceded that the Indians have no legal claim, but that they have certain equities, which are recognized, and they get the money. Now, this is what Congress agreed should be done:

SEC. 2. That the net proceeds arising from the sale and disposition of the lands to be so opened to entry and settlement shall be set apart in the Treasury of the United States for the time being, but subject to such future appropriation for public use as Congress may make, and that until so otherwise appropriated may be subject to expenditure by the Secretary of the Interior from time to time, in such amounts as he shall deem best, in the building of schoolhouses, the maintenance of schools for such Indians, for the payment of such part of the local taxation as may be properly applied to the lands allotted to such Indians, as he shall think fit so long as such allotted lands shall be held in trust and exempt from taxation, and in such other ways as he may deem proper for the promotion of education, civilization, and self-support among said Indians.

If the Government changes that law and opens the lands for settlement without selling them, I think it must be evident to everyone that the Indians will come forward and claim that they have an equitable right to this $1,500,000, and they will get it.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that the bill has been reported favorably by the Committee on Indian Affairs and that it has the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior. It applies the homestead provisions to the Colville Indian Reservation, which was opened to settlement in 1891 and which is already almost entirely settled, so far as the lands are arable.

As to every other Indian reservation that has been opened to settlement, no matter how much the cost to the Government, it has had the homestead law applied to it; and if Congress follows its well-defined policy, unless an exception is to be made as to the State of Washington, this bill ought to pass.

Since the decision of the Supreme Court in the Lone Wolf case there is no question that these Indians will have no claim for reclamation against the Government, unless it be by virtue of the language of the act which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has read to the Senate. It will be seen by reference to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs accompanying the law from which the Senator read that they will have no claim even under that, because that committee in its report to the Senate guard against any such implication. I hold in my hand the report made by Mr. Manderson, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, May 12, 1892, on the bill to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Indians residing on the Colville Reservation, in the State of Washington, which concludes thus:

The committee are also of the opinion that the Indians should be secured in their schoolhouse, sawmill, and gristmill, on Bonaparte Creek, unless they desire to select better locations for these institutions. While unwilling to make payment to the Indians for these lands not used for allotment purposes, the committee recognize a moral obligation on the part of the Government to aid them in their endeavors to attain a higher civilization and ultimate fitness for citizenship, and therefore advise that the proceeds arising from the sale of the parts of the reservation disposed of under the land laws of the United States be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of these Indians, subject, principal and interest, to expenditure in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior for certain enumerated purposes in promotion of their welfare, but with the unexpended balance at all times subject to the disposition of Congress.

This is simply an act of justice to the State of Washington, and puts the settlers on this reservation on the same plane as settlers on all other lands bought from the Indians.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Mr. DEPEW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16724) to provide for an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 7053) to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him, which will be read to the Senate for its information, subject to objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, but before concluding was interrupted by

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Army appropriation bill, which was assigned for consideration at this hour.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16567) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, in view of the strong and very earnest remarks of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] yesterday in regard to general legislation on an appropriation bill—although he did not press the point of order, he reserved it, and although there are conflicting opinions among good parliamentarians as to whether the amendment which was then under consideration is subject to the point of order or not—to save any question, I ask that section 2, on page 15, including the section number, down to and including line 7, on page 17, being the staff amendment, be disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The recollection of the Chair is that the amendment was adopted, but that the point of order was reserved, so that the Senator from Vermont now asks that the vote by which this amendment was adopted be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Now the Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes; I wish to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. PROCTOR. I now ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment, beginning in line 11, page 40, and ending on line 3, page 41, was adopted. I have a letter from the Surgeon-General regarding it. The amendment in the form in which I now propose to place it will make no material difference, but puts the language in proper form. I move, in line 10, on page 40, to strike out "five" and restore the original word "four," and then to strike out the whole of the following amendment and insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment in line 10, on page 40, striking out "four" and inserting "five," and also the amendment adopted, beginning in line 10, on page 40, and going to line 3, on page 41, inclusive, be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

The Senator from Vermont now asks that the amendment be withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection, and it is withdrawn.

Mr. PROCTOR. I now move to restore the word "four" in line 10, on page 40, so as to make the amount $450,000, as it originally stood.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. I now ask for the adoption of the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert in lieu of the words stricken out the following:

MEDICAL EXPENSES, FURLOUGHED SOLDIERS, SPANISH WAR.

For the payment, or the reimbursement of payments made, of just bills and charges for the support, care, and treatment, including proper hospital charges, of sick officers and enlisted men of the Regular and Volunteer Armies of the United States while they were absent from duty on leave or on furlough, or otherwise, by direction or by permission of proper authority, on or after April 21, 1898, and up to and including April 11, 1899, in like manner as if the said officers and enlisted men had been on duty at the times when and places where the said bills and charges were incurred, the sum of $200,000 is hereby reappropriated from the balance remaining unexpended of the appropriation of $2,000,000, made by the act approved March 2, 1901; and shall remain and continue available for the purposes hereinbefore set forth for and during the term of two years from and after the date of the approval of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORAKER. On yesterday the Senate adopted an amendment on my motion, on page 14, after the word "Army," at the end of line 15. I want to amend that amendment which was then adopted. I wish to insert after the word "have," in the last line of the amendment, the words "while so serving."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the amendment referred to by him was agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FORAKER. It was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, and I suppose it can be amended in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; but if there be no objection, it can be amended now.

Mr. FORAKER. I desire to amend it now by inserting the words I have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment yesterday adopted on his motion will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The amendment adopted yesterday, on motion of Mr. FORAKER, was, on page 14, after the word "Army," at the end of line 15, to insert:

Provided further, That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an officer of the Signal Corps as chief of the telegraph and cipher bureau of the Executive Office, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a major.

It is now proposed after the word "have," in the last line, to insert "while so serving."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I rise to ask for the consideration at this time of the motion made by me to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 15449) to increase the efficiency of the Army was passed. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] agrees that the vote shall be reconsidered with a view of disagreeing to the amendment which I will indicate if the motion shall be agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that consent is given simply to make the amendment to which the Senator refers, and that then the bill be immediately put upon its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed would be withdrawn, and the bill would stand passed.

Mr. BERRY. The motion to reconsider will first have to be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the votes by which the amendments to this bill were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time and passed be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The bill is now before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the amendment reported by the committee, to insert the words "or the Secretary of War" on page 3, section 4, line 4, be disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the amendment by which the words "or the Secretary of War" were inserted after the word "President," on page 3, section 4, line 4, be reconsidered, and that the amendment inserting those words be disagreed to. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that section 6 of the bill be disagreed to, for the reason that precisely the same provision has just been passed in the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask that that particular part of the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] asks unanimous consent that the vote by which section 6 was agreed to be reconsidered, and that the amendment be rejected.

Mr. PROCTOR. I will withdraw the motion, Mr. President. The amendment will do no harm, I think, as it stands.

Mr. PETTUS. I am not making any objection. I merely want information, so as to know what I am called upon to vote for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. CLAPP. I now ask that the reading of the bill (S. 7053) to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States be resumed at the point where it was left off.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] asks unanimous consent that the bill which was laid aside at the hour of 1 o'clock, and which was partially read, may be further read for the information of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 7053) to further regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, section 1, line 5, after the word "omitted," to strike out "by any lessee, trustee, receiver, officer, agent, or representative of such corporation" and insert "to be done by any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such corporation;" in line 10, after the word "said," to strike out "act" and insert "acts or under this act;" in line 11, after the word "misdemeanor," to insert "committed;" on page 2, line 2, after the word "acts," to insert "or by this act;" and in line 3, before the word "except," to strike out "individuals" and insert "such persons;" so as to read:

That anything done or omitted to be done by a corporation common carrier, subject to the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof which, if done or omitted to be done by any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such corporation, would constitute a misdemeanor under said acts or under this act shall be held to be a misdemeanor committed by such corporation, and upon conviction thereof it shall be subject to like penalties as are prescribed in said acts or by this act with reference to such persons except as such penalties are herein changed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 15, after the words "subject to," to strike out "the acts" and insert "said act;" in line 16, before the word "whereby," to insert "and the acts amendatory thereto;" in line 19, after the word "said," to strike out "acts" and insert "act;" and in line 19, after the word "commerce," to insert "and the acts amendatory thereto, or whereby any other advantage is given or discrimination is practiced;" so as to read:

The willful failure upon the part of any carrier subject to said acts to file and publish the tariffs or rates and charges as required by said acts or strictly to observe such tariffs until changed according to law, shall be a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof the corporation offending shall be subject to a fine not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000 for each offense; and it shall be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation to offer, grant, or give or to solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect of the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce by any common carrier subject to said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereto whereby any such property shall by any device whatever be transported at a less rate than that named in the tariffs published and filed by such carrier, as is required by said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereto, or whereby any other advantage is given or discrimination is practiced.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, page 3, after line 8, to insert:

Every violation of this section shall be prosecuted in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes within the district in which such violation was committed or through which the transportation may have been conducted; and whenever the offense is begun in one jurisdiction and completed in another it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in either jurisdiction in the same manner as if the offense had been actually and wholly committed therein.

In construing and enforcing the provisions of this section the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any common carrier acting within the scope of his employment shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such carrier as well as that of the person. Whenever any carrier files with the Interstate Commerce Commission or publishes a particular rate under the provisions of the act to regulate commerce or acts amendatory thereto, or participates in any rates so filed or published, that rate as against such carrier, its officers or agents, in any prosecution begun under this act, shall be conclusively deemed to be the legal rate, and any departure from such rate, or any offer to depart therefrom, shall be deemed to be an offense under this section of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 4, line 11, after the word "parties," to strike out "all persons," and in the same line, after the word "carrier," to insert "all persons;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That in any proceeding for the enforcement of the provisions of the statutes relating to interstate commerce, whether such proceedings be instituted before the Interstate Commerce Commission or be begun originally in any circuit court of the United States, it shall be lawful to include as parties, in addition to the carrier, all persons interested in or affected by the rate, regulation, or practice under consideration, and inquiries, investigations, orders, and decrees may be made with reference to and against such additional parties in the same manner, to the same extent, and subject to the same provisions as are or shall be authorized by law with respect to carriers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 4, line 23, after the word "petition," to insert "alleging such facts;" in line 24, after the word "States," to insert "sitting in equity;" in line 25, after the word "parties," to strike out "alleging such practice" and insert:

And when the act complained of is alleged to have been committed or as being committed in part in more than one judicial district or State, it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, and determined in either such judicial district or State.

In line 5, page 5, after the word "court," to strike out "to;" in the same line, after the word "summarily," to insert the word "to;" in line 6, after the word "circumstances," to insert:

Upon such notice and in such manner as the court shall direct and without the formal pleadings and proceedings applicable to ordinary suits in equity, and to make such other persons or corporations parties thereto as the court may deem necessary.

In line 11, after the words "of the," to strike out "allegation, to" and insert "allegations of said petition said court shall;" in line 13, after the words "tariffs or," to insert "direct and;" in line 14, after the word "orders," to insert "writs;" in line 15, before the word "and," to insert "writs;" in line 16, after the word "carrier," to insert "subject to the right of appeal as now provided by law;" in line 18, after the word "States," to strike out "under the direction of the Attorney-General;" in line 7, page 6, after the word "transaction," to insert:

The claim that such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such person from testifying, but such testimony or evidence shall not be used against such persons or corporations on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

And beginning in line 12, page 6, to strike out:

But all carriers, corporations, or shippers whose books and papers are produced in evidence in said proceedings, and all persons required to testify shall have the same immunity from prosecution and punishment, and to the same extent and subject to the same provisions, as is provided for in an act approved February 11, 1893, entitled "An act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in cases or proceedings under or connected with an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and the amendments thereto.'"

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That whenever the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have reasonable ground for belief that any common carrier is engaged in the carriage of passengers or freight traffic between given points at less than the published rates on file, or is committing any discriminations forbidden by law, it shall be authorized to present a petition alleging such facts to the circuit court of the United States sitting in equity having jurisdiction of the parties; and when the act complained of is alleged to have been committed or as being committed in part in more than one judicial district or State, it may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, and determined in either such judicial district or State, whereupon it shall be the duty of the court summarily to inquire into the circumstances, upon such notice and in such manner as the court shall direct and without the formal pleadings and proceedings applicable to ordinary suits in equity, and to make such other persons or corporations parties thereto as the court may deem necessary, and upon being satisfied of the truth of the allegations of said petition said court shall enforce an observance of the published tariffs or direct and require a discontinuance of such discrimination by proper orders, writs, and process, which said orders, writs, and process may be enforceable as well against the parties interested in the traffic as against the carrier, subject to the right of appeal as now provided by law. It shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States to institute and prosecute such proceedings, and the proceedings provided for by this act shall not preclude the bringing of suit for the recovery of damages by any party injured, or any other action provided by said act approved February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," and the acts amendatory thereof. And in proceedings under this act and the acts to regulate commerce the said courts shall have the power to compel the attendance of witnesses, both upon the part of the carrier and the shipper, who shall be required to answer on all subjects relating directly or indirectly to the matter in controversy, and to compel the production of all books and papers, both of the carrier and the shipper, which relate directly or indirectly to such transaction; the claim that such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such person from testifying, but such testimony or evidence shall not be used against such persons or corporations on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

Mr. CLAPP. On behalf of the committee I offer an amendment to strike out the words "of the parties" where they occur in line 25, on page 4.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Referring to page 6, we provided as to a person giving testimony that the testimony should not be used against him. Upon consultation of the later authorities we find that the immunity is not broad enough, and on behalf of the committee I offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 7, after the word "transaction," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The claim that such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such person from testifying or such corporation producing its books and papers; but no person or corporation shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he or it may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, in such proceeding.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I rise to renew my request that a day and an hour may be fixed at which a vote shall be taken on the bill known as the omnibus statehood bill, now the regular order. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that a vote be taken on the 19th day of February next, at 2 o'clock p. m., upon the bill and amendments pending and those which may then be offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the vote on the pending bill, known as the omnibus bill, and all amendments then pending and all at that time offered, shall be taken at 2 o'clock on the afternoon of February 19. Is there objection?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I regret that I can not accede to the Senator's request. I wish to say in this connection that the Senator certainly sees that such a consent is impossible. But four prepared arguments have been made upon our side of the question, but two upon the Senator's side, and there has been only a limited amount of regular ordinary running debate. A very much larger number of Senators upon our side of this matter than those who have spoken intend to speak, and I have no doubt a larger number on the Senator's side than those who have already spoken for it wish to defend the omnibus bill. The junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES] is only in the midst of his able and brilliant argument. He will be followed by the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] in a carefully prepared, exhaustive, and, I make bold to say, absolutely convincing speech. After him many other Senators desire to be heard. Therefore, the Senator from Pennsylvania will readily see that it is perfectly impossible to consent to the Senator's request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana objects.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I will ask, then, whether unanimous consent can be given to take the vote at the same hour on the 2d day of March next?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator make it the 5th? [Laughter.]

Mr. QUAY. I will not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that on the 2d day of March next, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, without further debate, a vote may be taken on the omnibus bill, so called, and then pending amendments and amendments at that time offered. Is there objection?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, it is impossible to agree upon any specific date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana objects.

Mr. QUAY. I should myself have objected to a vote on that occasion if the Senator from Indiana had not. As to his suggestion in reference to Senators upon the affirmative of the statehood issue, that there are a large number of them who desire to address the Senate and who have not yet done so, I will merely state that my request for unanimous consent is not at all offensive to those Senators.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not say there were a large number of Senators on the affirmative side of the omnibus proposition who desired to speak. I said I entertained the hope that there would be a number more than those who have already so ably spoken for it who would desire to defend the bill. Of course if that is not well placed, it is not well placed.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is delusive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not now before the Senate. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the omnibus statehood bill, so called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the omnibus statehood bill, so called, which will be stated by its title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, when I yielded the floor yesterday I was contending for the right, and the corresponding duty, of independent thought and fearless investigation on the part of a Member or Senator, and that, while acting here under the sanction of an oath, considering the general welfare of the nation, we are not conclusively foreclosed by the phraseology of a particular resolution which some political convention may choose to adopt.

I wish to draw the distinction between a general declaration of principle by a political convention and a concrete application of it to a given measure. I do not wish to be understood, Mr. President, as calling in question the authority, the binding force, or the sanction of a general declaration of political policy by a national convention. It is entitled both here and everywhere else to the greatest respect.

But, Mr. President, suppose for the purposes of the argument we were to concede the conclusive effect of the platform declaration at Philadelphia, the interpretation put upon the language by the advocates of the pending measure is fallacious and unsound.

In 1896 the Republican convention declared in substance in favor of the admission of these Territories as soon as they were fit. In 1900 by a shorter resolution the Republican convention declared in favor of early admission. I apprehend, Mr. President, that under a fair construction the two resolutions are substantially the same, although phrased differently. It certainly will not be contended that the members of the convention of 1900 had in mind the admission of Territories that were not fit.

Both resolutions contemplated the fair exercise of legislative discretion. And when the matter is all summed up, we find that it is not a declaration in favor of this specific measure or of any specific measure, and after all amounts to no more than this: The Republican delegates there assembled pronounced it as their judgment that the interests of the Republican party would be promoted by the early admission of these Territories as soon as Congress found that they were fit to be admitted. This is not a foundation upon which to rest this omnibus bill, calling for the admission of a bunch of Territories, but is a mere declaration of general policy to which I am willing to bow and which ought to be held in high respect by the members of that party.

Now, Mr. President, following the suggestion of the report of the committee——

Mr. MASON. The Senator from Wisconsin will not object if I call his attention at this point to the exact language of our platform?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. It reads:

We favor home rule for, and the early admission to statehood of, the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma.

Mr. SPOONER. There is something else there.

Mr. MASON. No.

Mr. SPOONER. There is something about home rule.

Mr. MASON. I read that. That is all there is on the subject, and it mentions the three Territories that are named in the omnibus bill.

Mr. QUARLES. I had that language in mind. My proposition, I will say to the Senator, is that "early" does not mean "immediate" or "hasty," nor does it call for premature consideration. The two platforms are exactly in harmony, and neither seeks to exclude legislative discretion.

IRRIGATION AND WATER SUPPLY.

It was suggested in the report that the first consideration perhaps in approaching this discussion was the interests of the Territories themselves, and in that connection I wish to submit an aspect of the question which has not been considered in this debate, which, it seems to me, from the standpoint of Arizona and New Mexico, is entitled to serious attention. If anything has been demonstrated by history and confirmed by this discussion it is that the great need of these two Territories is water. So important is water in view of the climatic conditions that it is water which now determines the measure of productiveness, and not the soil.

We have been informed that only about one-fourth of 1 per cent of the area of these Territories has yet been brought under irrigation. We are further informed that the facilities for irrigation have already outstripped the supply of water. There are aqueducts and ditches that are entirely dry because there is not water to carry on the work of irrigation. No man familiar with the situation can have a doubt that it is water that must develop that country, if it is ever developed, and that its supply is far more important to those communities than statehood can possibly be.

Mr. President, in all my reading I know of only one more importunate demand for water than is made by these two Territories, and that came from the arid region presided over by his Satanic Majesty, and was the appeal of the rich man to Father Abraham to send him a drop of water to cool his parched tongue.

Now, the next proposition in order is this: The water so imperatively needed can never come from the clouds. It can never be gathered up by private capital or individual energy. There is absolutely no recourse except to the strong arm of the Federal Government. Uncle Sam must come to the front with his millions and by an expensive system of dams and reservoirs lay the floods and torrents under contribution.

Now, the question recurs—and it is worthy the serious attention of every man who is to pass upon this matter, not as a politician, but as a statesman—Will statehood at this time advance or retard this great improvement? I grant that if statehood would promote irrigation the interests of those Territories would lie in that direction. If, on the other hand, it will retard progress in that direction, the real friends of the Territories ought to act accordingly.

Congress has listened to the appeal of these people and has year by year appropriated a vast sum of money for preliminary surveys, for ascertaining where reservoirs could be successfully constructed, for measuring streams, and doing all preliminary work so necessary to the introduction of a general scheme of irrigation. Congress has passed a bill whereby a large portion of the area of the Western country has been devoted to this purpose. We are told by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] that already, under the operation of that act, some eight or nine million dollars have accumulated, and the expectation is that a very much larger sum will be added to this fund. Furthermore, Congress has given to the Territory of New Mexico 600,000 acres of the public domain to facilitate this general purpose.

Now, allow me to direct attention to the particular framework of this irrigation statute. It will be remembered that it passed this body without debate and without analysis. As the law stands to-day, this enormous fund, together with its accretion, may be taken into these two Territories and expended there in exploitation and development, and the only requirement of the act is an approximate evening up or distribution among the States after a period of ten years. Now, this legislation would seem to offer a great opportunity for these two Territories.

Mr. President, the greatest obstacle which the scheme of irrigation will have to meet is the limited power of the Federal Government and the plenary jurisdiction of the States. The officers of the Government to whom this work will be intrusted must speedily discover that there are serious impediments in the way of an intelligent administration of the measure within the limits of sovereign States.

Let me illustrate. Officers of the United States go to the State of Colorado, for instance, to impound flood waters. Some of you are familiar with her constitution. In her organic law she has laid down certain principles regarding the appropriation and distribution of water. Not only that, but she has built up a system of local statutes and a whole network of decisions, and around those are clustered usages and customs which have the force of law. We go now, for the purpose of administering this act, into the sovereign State of Colorado. Can we appropriate water from any one of her streams? Why, Mr. President, not at all. By her constitution she has asserted that the exclusive jurisdiction over those streams belongs to the State of Colorado. The question of navigation not being involved, her authority over those waterways is supreme. We can never divert the water from any stream in Colorado without an enabling act from her legislature.

Suppose we get legislative permission and the Government builds the necessary dams and reservoirs and we have succeeded in impounding the flood waters of one of the Colorado streams. Thus far we have proceeded by the permission of the State. Now, the minute we conduct from that Federal reservoir a stream of water into an aqueduct or a lateral or a ditch it falls immediately under the jurisdiction of the State of Colorado. Its laws attach to it; we must observe its usages and its customs, which are diametrically opposed to the common law. What then? The United States has absolutely lost all control over that stream of water as soon as it has left its reservoir.

The State of Colorado may suspend its jurisdiction over a stream to permit us to appropriate water; but it never can, and never will suspend its system of laws, or surrender its usages and customs regarding the appropriation and use of water. So that you have the United States Government there engaged in a great scheme involving enormous expenditures, which scheme the Federal Government is powerless to control.

Now, let me tell you what will happen—and the officers of the Government will be quick to discern this as soon as they begin to carry it out in actual detail. You have built great reservoirs. You have stored your flood water. You are proceeding to distribute it. You are obliged to carry your aqueduct over a private estate. The owner of that estate objects. You must either abandon your scheme or you must have recourse to condemnation. You institute your proceedings of condemnation, and then you meet a very serious question, which, briefly stated, is this: While engaged in distributing water over a titled area, such as you would have to do in a State like Colorado, is it a legitimate Federal public purpose? That question lies at the very foundation of your right to proceed. Can the United States condemn land to carry on the business of selling water? So growing out of the dual relation of the Federal and State governments and the different systems of laws, you will in the various States encounter no end of difficulties, perplexities, and complications.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. QUARLES. With pleasure.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator if that is not the case with respect to all great questions like this? Do we not have complications and tribulations and troubles until the question is thoroughly sifted out in the courts of the country?

Mr. QUARLES. I do not know any place on this green earth where trouble does not come. I have never yet known any great project to be adopted where there were no complications. I am about to speak in a moment of the condition in these Territories as compared with States and to suggest that this scheme can be carried out with far less difficulty, with fewer complications, in a Territory than in a State.

In this connection I may say now that when the Government goes into its own territory it has to reckon with no other sovereign. It also has an influence in framing the laws controlling the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Congress has the power to supervise the enactment of Territorial laws, and presumably the statutes in those Territories, under the circumstances, would be framed to facilitate this scheme. Every facility within the lawmaking power would be afforded.

The streams of a Territory are under the exclusive control of Congress. You are not compelled to appeal to the sovereign will of a State. There the Government finds large masses of unappropriated land, and I would suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that that is a most important circumstance as bearing upon the constitutional question and the Federal authority to engage in this enterprise at all.

If the unappropriated area is sufficiently large, so that the Government as a primary purpose is seeking to improve its own land, that might be held and would undoubtedly be held by the courts to be a legitimate Federal purpose. But in a State which has been settled, where the lands have been appropriated, this Government in distributing water for sale among settlers perhaps would stand upon the same footing as any other great proprietor who was distributing water for hire. But in a Territory where it has great areas of unappropriated land the question presents entirely a different legal aspect. The Government goes in and takes possession of a stream. It impounds the flood waters and carries its aqueduct over its own territory for the purpose of improving its own land. Such a state of facts would simplify the question.

Mr. President, the people of these two Territories have become excited over the question of statehood, and nothing is more natural. We can all understand it, especially we who have lived in a new Territory. But I submit it to the candid judgment of all who hear me, whether in view of these propositions the people of New Mexico and Arizona will not be entitled, almost of right, to have the larger portion of this fund expended within their own limits to the exclusion of States, and to have all the experimentation done there, and is not that of greater benefit, of greater import to those Territories than to acquire the status of statehood?

As I look upon it, Mr. President, statehood at the present time would be an impediment, an obstruction, and therefore a calamity to these Territories. If they should unite their energies under this beneficent act of Congress to secure the expenditure of that sum of money within their own area reclaiming lands, furnishing homes and farms for thousands of settlers, they need not then trouble themselves about statehood. Population will come, wealth will come, and statehood will follow as certainly as night follows day.

Mr. President, if I understand the attitude of Arizona, if I comprehend the arguments which have been made here in her interest, statehood is desired as a stimulus. Statehood is looked upon as desirable because it will attract large numbers of people, because it will attract capital; but in my humble judgment the irrigation scheme will bring to them all of these desirable elements much more quickly and much more surely than the acquisition of statehood.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. QUARLES. With pleasure.

Mr. DUBOIS. I was paying close attention to the Senator from Wisconsin, but I may have misunderstood him, notwithstanding. Was the Senator arguing that when the Federal Government went into the State of Colorado it would there be confronted with the Colorado laws and it could not interfere with them, because Colorado was a sovereign State; but that in going into these proposed States of New Mexico and Arizona, they being under the control of the Government, it would not be restricted as in the State of Colorado?

Mr. QUARLES. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUBOIS. I would ask, then, if the Congress of the United States has not authority to waive any rights which it might have in those two Territories. Is the Congress of the United States able by legislation to waive any rights which it might have in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona?

Mr. QUARLES. I did not catch the Senator's point. I do not understand the waiver of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. DUBOIS. I understood the Senator to agree to the proposition that when the Federal Government goes to the State of Colorado to build reservoirs, canals, dams, etc., it can not contravene the laws of the State of Colorado——

Mr. QUARLES. Yes.

Mr. DUBOIS. That it is a sovereign State. Now, then, can it contravene, for instance, the laws of New Mexico and Arizona?

Mr. QUARLES. Undoubtedly. Congress has supervisory control over all Territorial legislation.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well. Then I come to my question again: Has Congress the power to waive its right to set aside any statutes of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico?

Mr. QUARLES. Congress has no power to divest itself of any legislative function. The Constitution imposes that upon Congress, and it would be beyond the power of Congress to divest itself of that discretion.

Mr. DUBOIS. As I said the other day, I am not a lawyer, and therefore I can not follow these refinements; but Congress has done that very thing in the irrigation act which I have here.

Mr. QUARLES. I will say to the distinguished Senator that if Congress has assumed to do such a thing the act was utterly nugatory and void.

Mr. DUBOIS. If the Senator will pardon me, I will read the act of Congress. This is section 8 of the national irrigation act passed by Congress. It says:

> That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State or Territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, or any vested right acquired thereunder, and the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall proceed in conformity with such laws, and nothing herein shall in any way affect any right of any State or of the Federal Government or of any landowner, appropriator, or user of water in, to, or from any interstate stream or the waters thereof.

Mr. QUARLES. There are two branches of that proposition, of which I will speak separately, if the Senator will permit me. The first declaration, that it is not intended to impinge upon the legislation of the State, is, of course, a truism. Congress could not do that. The proposition that it was not intended to change any of the laws of a Territory does not involve any renouncement of the power of Congress in that regard. It simply indicates that there is no present purpose in that particular act to do that thing.

Further, I will explain to my distinguished friend from Idaho, Congress has not, as he will see by reflection, undertaken to withdraw or renounce any of the control that it has over Territorial legislation. It amounts to a statement that for the time being it is satisfied with the legislative conditions in those Territories, and it goes no further.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. Of course I feel my disadvantage in arguing a point which is a legal proposition with the distinguished Senator and able lawyer from Wisconsin, but this word is used here, which is a very strong word, it seems to me:

> That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere——

Mr. SPOONER. In that act.

Mr. DUBOIS. No—

> with the laws of any State or Territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation.

It is not to interfere with the laws of any Territory covering this whole irrigation problem.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator take that as a contract binding Congress never to interfere with existing laws on that subject in any Territory, or does he construe it as my colleague does? My colleague needs no help from any source in the discussion of such a question or any other, but I insist that he correctly construes it as a declaration by Congress that it is not intended by that act to interfere with any laws existing in the Territories.

Mr. DUBOIS. It is that Congress shall not interfere in respect to irrigation laws; that it shall place the Territories on precisely the same basis as States in regard to its laws on the subject of irrigation.

Mr. SPOONER. Congress could not place the Territories on the same basis as the States, beyond its power to change it.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I was one of the subcommittee to draw the present act, and there were some able lawyers on the committee. It was a committee of 17, composed of representatives from each of the arid and semiarid States and Territories. One question which we discussed, and the hardest question for us to decide, was whether the States and the Territories should have the control all the time or whether Congress in passing this national irrigation act should come in and assume control, affecting the distribution and use and conservation of waters. We decided that the laws of the Territories and States should govern. That was the intention of those men, and, as I said, there were a great many lawyers on the committee.

Mr. SPOONER. But, if the Senator will permit me, did this committee decide that where a Territory had been admitted into the Union with a constitution which gave the new State control over waters originating in the State Congress had the power to abrogate that constitution and assume that control on behalf of the General Government? My colleague said that the declaration in this act that the act should not be construed to interfere with the rights of the States or the laws of the State was a truism. Is it not so?

Mr. DUBOIS. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it anything more than that?

Mr. DUBOIS. No; it is a truism.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a truism?

Mr. DUBOIS. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. In other words, it is an assertion by Congress that this act is not intended to do——

Mr. DUBOIS. Something which it could not do?
Mr. SPOONER. What the act could not do?
Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.
Mr. SPOONER. But is it not true that as to the Territories an entirely different rule prevails?
Mr. DUBOIS. I should think not.
Mr. SPOONER. Have we not the power to enact all the legislation for the Territories? Have we not the power to overrule and abrogate every act passed by the legislature of a Territory?
Mr. DUBOIS. Undoubtedly.
Mr. SPOONER. Then, does that mean anything more than what was stated by my colleague, that that act was not intended to abrogate the existing laws of the Territories on the subject of water?
Mr. DUBOIS. Plainly not, in my judgment.
Mr. SPOONER. Very well; that is all my colleague asserted.
Mr. DUBOIS. Oh, no. The Territory could pass a law, for instance, and Congress could refuse to sanction that law and destroy it; that Congress could do. If, however, they had not passed a law and Congress says we will allow you to pass this law, they would have authority to pass it.
Mr. SPOONER. But that——
Mr. DUBOIS. Congress now gives up the right——
Mr. SPOONER. No; Mr. President——
Mr. DUBOIS. In this act to interfere with the laws of the Territories, knowing that it could not do it.
Mr. SPOONER. No; the act says that it shall not be construed to interfere with any law passed by the Territorial legislature; in other words, that it is not intended to repeal any Territorial legislation.
Mr. DUBOIS. No; that it shall not interfere with those laws.
Mr. SPOONER. It does not say that.
Mr. DUBOIS. I-n-t-e-r-f-e-r-e.
Mr. SPOONER. But that is that this act shall not interfere with them. Does the Senator not see the distinction between a statement by Congress that a particular act was not intended to interfere with the Territorial legislation and the proposition that Congress has abdicated the constitutional function and will never exercise the power to abrogate any Territorial act which it has passed?
Mr. DUBOIS. Now let me reverse it. Do you suppose that Congress, after having passed that act, would interfere and change the laws of these Territories in regard to the use and distribution of water? Is it not a guaranty that it will not?
Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, that begs the question. The Senator says Congress has guaranteed that it would not; in other words, that Congress has abdicated its power.
Mr. DUBOIS. Yes.
Mr. SPOONER. By contract?
Mr. DUBOIS. Yes; by law.
Mr. SPOONER. Not to change any act of any Territory that regulated the use of water, I say, as my colleague says, that Congress has done no such thing. I say that all Congress has done, and all Congress can do, so far as the Territory is concerned, is to say that the particular act in which you find that language is not intended to abrogate any law existing in the Territory regulating the use of water. The Territory is the United States in a sense. It belongs to the United States, and the Congress of the United States, representing the Government legislatively, does not enter into a contract with itself that it will not change laws which itself through a delegated authority has enacted.
Mr. DUBOIS. Now, Mr. President——
Mr. SPOONER. In other words, I insist, just as my colleague does, that Congress is as free to-day as it was before that act was passed to enact laws for a Territory regulating the use of water, if in the judgment of Congress the public interest requires it. Does the Senator mean to contend here that this irrigation act is a contract between Congress and a Territory, and that Congress never will interfere, no matter what the public interest may demand, with some act passed by a Territorial legislature regulating the use of water?
Mr. DUBOIS. I intend to say this: I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that this language is a truism so far as the States are concerned and that Congress intended to put the Territories on the same footing with the States. It says in express terms that it will not interfere with the laws of the Territories in regard to the use and distribution of water. I would agree that Congress could reverse itself and interfere in a Territory; but it says here plainly that it will not interfere, and I assume that Congress will maintain that position. What I am objecting to is that under the language of that act the Senator from Wisconsin argues that Congress will interfere.
Mr. SPOONER. No; I did not argue that.
Mr. DUBOIS. He was making a distinction in regard to the use, distribution, storage, etc., of waters in the States and in the Territories.
Mr. SPOONER. I did not argue, nor did my colleague——
Mr. DUBOIS. I meant your colleague.
Mr. SPOONER. My colleague did not argue that this was an assertion by Congress that it could not interfere, or that it could be construed by any possibility as an agreement that it would not interfere. It is only a declaration by Congress that that act is not intended to interfere with the legislation of any Territory regulating the use of water. But when the Senator goes beyond that and contends that it is a contract on the part of Congress that the legislation of a Territory regulating the use of water is beyond its reach until statehood, I enter my protest.
I beg my colleague's pardon. I intended to give him a rest; that is all.
Mr. DUBOIS. I beg the pardon of both Senators, but I do not propose, even by such adroit and able lawyers as they are, to be diverted. The Senator's colleague was arguing in regard to this very act, that the money set apart would be in this fund, and he was proceeding to discuss the effect of the irrigation act, and in discussing the act he puts the Territories in a different class from that occupied by the States.
Mr. SPOONER. No, Mr. President, he did no so far as this act was concerned, as I understood him, and I listened to him carefully. He said that this act Congress did not intend, and it so declared, to interfere with any legislation in the Territories regulating the use of water. He said that in this act Congress did not intend to interfere, as it could not, with any act of a State regulating the use of water.
Mr. DUBOIS. Yes, I will agree to that.
Mr. SPOONER. Did my colleague intimate that Congress by this act had lost the constitutional power to regulate for itself the use of water in the Territories hereafter? I did not so understand him.
Mr. DUBOIS. No, nor did I say it. You must have misunderstood me.
Mr. SPOONER. Well, I may have done so, but I think not.
Mr. DUBOIS. I stated that he was arguing the effect of this act——
Mr. SPOONER. Then we agree.
Mr. DUBOIS. And he illustrated it by referring to Colorado, in the first place, and then went to the Territories and proceeded to show that Congress could do in a Territory what it could not do in a State. Is not that a fair statement of it?
Mr. SPOONER. That is true.
Mr. DUBOIS. I say that he was arguing that this act itself provides that there shall be no distinction so far as the use, distribution, and conservation of water and all things appertaining to irrigation is concerned between a State and a Territory.
Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, let me illustrate what I mean, so that my friend from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] will have no doubt whatever about my position. I think the distinguished Senator has misunderstood me as he evidently did the distinguished lawyers who were trying to enlighten his conscience at the time that bill was before his committee.
Congress, by that enactment, said that it recognized—as indeed it must—the enactments of the several States on this subject. Right there I wish to say that recognition is not of a single system or a single code of regulations, but, if the Senator will look into it, he will find one law in California, another law in Colorado, and still another system in Idaho. The law governing the appropriation of water has been inflected by the particular uses that were desired to be made of water in the particular localities. For instance, where water was used for mining purposes, one system grew up and usages ripened into law. So the recognition Congress was bound to make in that irrigation act included all those varied and diverse systems, and the Government would have to reckon with each one of those independent sovereigns and their absolute laws and customs whenever it entered their territory. That is the force of the first part of the concession made in the irrigation bill.
The second proposition amounts, as my distinguished colleague says, to nothing more than this: That for the time being by this particular bill Congress does not choose to change any of the laws in any of the Territories now governing the use and appropriation of water, but the power to do so still remains unimpaired by any provision of that bill.
Let me illustrate: As soon as the attention of the Federal officers who are to administer that irrigation act is called to these fundamental principles I believe they will see the importance of trying this great experiment where they will not be fettered by State jurisdiction and State laws. If it should be found necessary to condemn real estate in the Territory of Arizona to carry out this great project the Government might find it necessary to change the laws of that Territory regulating the exercise of the right of eminent domain in order to facilitate that work. That power the Government would have, and it would undoubtedly be exercised in the interest of the scheme of irrigation.

If the Senator will look into the law, he will see how great a part the right of eminent domain will play in the extension of any irrigation system. That advantage we would have in the Territory. That is one of the reasons why I say that if the people of Arizona and New Mexico, instead of devoting their energies to acquiring statehood, had combined to secure the appropriation and use of this money within their Territories in the first instance, and had appealed to the almost unlimited discretion of the officers under the irrigation law they would, in my humble judgment, have promoted the interests of their section much more than by holding statehood conventions and sending Delegates here to try to hasten admission into the Union.

SPECULATION AND EXPLOITATION.

Mr. President, the second proposition that I wish to advert to briefly also concerns the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. It is that the people of those two Territories have not yet reached a stage of development where they can safely dispense with the control and restraint of the Federal power. The evidence that has been presented by the committee shows conclusively the efforts that have been made in both Territories to escape or resist the control imposed by the Harrison Act. We find already that in certain parts of both Territories the rate of taxation has risen to the enormous level of 5 and 6 per cent. Such a rate of taxation is, of course, ruinous. These Territories are not exceptional in this regard. It seems to be an irresistible impulse on the part of new Commonwealths to run in debt; it is as irresistible and inevitable as the teething process with children. It is easily understood.

In new communities there exists a local public spirit, which is of great value in promoting development, but it can easily be aroused and fanned into a flame of excitement; so, I say, there is nothing exceptional in the situation of these Territories. But, Mr. President, the era of exploitation is certain to come to each of these communities as soon as statehood is granted. The promoters, the sharpers, will go to the new States, and their numbers will be like the locusts that invaded Egypt. There is one crop to be garnered in a new State which is not dependent on irrigation, and that is a crop of State and municipal bonds. If I mistake not, there is evidence that some astute husbandmen are prepared to gather this crop, which will fructify under the genial influence of statehood even in the arid region.

The Good Book has it that "Wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together," and, if I mistake not, if we should admit these two Territories as States there would be savage work done with beaks and talons. An era would be ushered in there such as we have seen in other States.

Take my own State as an illustration, or the State of Minnesota, whose able representative [Mr. NELSON] addressed himself to this question. Those States were settled by a strong, hardy race of pioneers. They were an intelligent people, many of them coming from New England and New York. They were well versed in the arts of government; and yet as soon as they took on the mantle of statehood there was opened up just such an era of exploitation. I have lived to see the sad effect of it upon those communities. I have seen cities and counties bond themselves for large sums of money for the building of railroads, and I have later seen the grass growing in the streets of those cities; I have seen them reduced to the humiliation of repudiation, carrying on long, vexatious lawsuits, many municipalities unable to have any local officers for fear of the service of a writ from the United States court with a view to enforcing those obligations. I have seen them, with their officers-elect, meeting only for a single occasion to pass the budget, and then all resigning, so that there would be nobody upon whom process could be served. In that way the whole progress of those municipalities was retarded for many long years.

The distinguished Senator from Minnesota spoke of the experience of his State in this regard. History repeats itself, and what happened in the States to which I have referred will happen in these proposed States. It is natural and easy for promoters to go into new communities and represent the great necessity of railroads, the great agency of building up infant communities, and the insidious suggestion is made at public meetings and elsewhere and through the press that all the State or the municipality has to do is to lend its credit to the scheme, that eventually it will be self-sustaining, will pay every dollar on demand, and will relieve the municipalities. But those suggestions are delusive, and in almost every instance the State or municipality issuing the bonds has been obliged in the end to pay the debt.

We have had here evidence from Arizona as to the issuance of Pima County bonds. I do not purpose to follow that subject at length, but it is only one of the features of what has been going on which indicates the restlessness of those communities, and their desire to promote their own growth by these adventitious aids. What would happen there now if we should take off the restraint of the Federal Government, if we should withdraw the protection of the Harrison Act, which prevents any of those municipalities from encumbering themselves to a greater extent than 4 per cent of the assessed valuation?

Their new liberty might be exercised in plunging themselves in debt to aid a multitude of schemes for internal improvement which would be presented in an alluring shape as calculated to build up the waste places and bring lasting glory to the new State.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the first witness who appeared before the subcommittee in Oklahoma made an argument against statehood even for Oklahoma, a very highly developed community, upon the ground that they were very prosperous and contented there now, and that railroads were being built with the money of investors who were investing their money as a legitimate matter, whereas, if they were admitted as a State and the 4 per cent limitation were removed, there would instantly be competition among the towns, as there had been in the past, and that the people would be burdened, as they have in other States, with an enormous amount of unnecessary debt; that if they remained as they were for a short time they would have all the railroads that they needed without any expense to the people. I saw a clipping in the Washington Post from some railroad journal, which I intended to bring down here, which went on to say that the Rock Island Railroad Company had determined to expend something like $20,000,000 in the extension of its lines in Oklahoma and the Indian Territory. If the 4 per cent limitation were removed, this witness argues, the people would build those roads themselves instead of their being built by subsidies. Certainly that is true of certain enterprises elsewhere in other Territories.

Mr. QUARLES. I am very thankful, Mr. President, for the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana. As he well intimates, if we continue those communities under the protecting care of the Federal Government, the railroads that ought to be built will be built by private capital. On the other hand, if we confer statehood now upon those communities, it requires no prophet to predict what will happen there. Railroads will be built that never ought to be built, and they will be built upon the strength of State and municipal bonds that never ought to be issued. In a short time, as the Senator says, if they remain in their present condition, they will have built those roads which are justified by the condition of the country, and will not engage in fatuous speculation such as all the recently admitted States have been concerned in.

Mr. President, we are advised by the evidence that a system of schools—a comprehensive system of education, I may say—has been established in these Territories. It seems to me far wiser that these schools should be permitted to do their perfect work, allow that people to become better capable of taking care of themselves, of administering the affairs of government, and acquiring greater resisting power in order that they may not be involved in these speculations when the invasion of exploitation shall come.

THE ORDINANCE OF 1787.

I wish to say a few words regarding the capacity of these two Territories for admission at this time. This omnibus bill suggests an illustration that a chain is no stronger than its weakest link, and an omnibus bill is no better than its worst provision. Therefore if it has been demonstrated here that either of these Territories is unfit for any reason for present admission, that should be an end of this entire measure. If Arizona has not sufficient population, or a population of such character as to entitle her to statehood, that is the end of the whole proposition, and we may dismiss it at once.

Much has been said regarding the question of population. It would be difficult, looking over the history of this country, and especially reviewing the acts admitting the several States, to arrive at any rule that ought to obtain in this case. The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], who seems to be almost the only Senator in favor of this measure who has skill or tact enough to attempt to defend it on the floor, made a long review of the various acts whereby States had been admitted to the Union. He discussed at great length the ordinance of 1787.

All the States that were admitted pursuant to the provisions of that ordinance, or pursuant to legislation extending that ordinance, stand in a class by themselves. They were admitted by reason of a distinct, definite compact, which was made by the early Congress with the people of the territory, and I think it is greatly to the credit of this nation that Congress saw fit to carry out that pledge to the very letter, although the ordinance itself was probably repealed by the Constitution.

In the first place, the ordinance of 1787 has no direct bearing upon the measure under consideration. These Territories are not included within its provisions. Then it remains simply to determine whether there is any argument by way of analogy to be made from the circumstances attending the admission of those States under that ordinance. I undertake to say that there is no analogy from which any deduction can be made at this time which is at all persuasive.

"Times change, and we change with them," and one has only to think for a moment of the situation in which this country was when the ordinance of 1787 was adopted to realize how futile it is to apply the doctrine of analogy in this case.

At that time, as suggested by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], steam was a sleeping giant; it had never turned a wheel or moved a paddle; electricity was only manifested by the lightning flash, which was looked upon as an emblem of the wrath of God. Beyond that narrow fringe of settlement along the Atlantic coast there stretched a trackless wilderness inhabited by hostile tribes. The States were few and feeble; they had been decimated and impoverished by a great war; they were torn asunder by internal discord; they were distressed by jealousies; they were smarting under the taunts of the monarchical governments of Europe. It was a life and death struggle then to establish in this new hemisphere the foundations of a free government. There was nothing strong about the Confederation at that time except the patriotic spirit of the old heroes who were concerned in administering that Government. It has been called a rope of sand. The necessity at that time for new States to make this feeble Government more strong and stable was such that every inducement had to be extended to the hardy pioneers to go into the forest and reclaim it and bring it into civilization, so that new States could be created to give greater strength and fiber to the Confederation.

The rule of the ordinance of 1787 was continued far beyond the emergencies out of which it arose; but we are dealing with the condition which prompted the adoption of that ordinance; and when we come to compare it with the present condition of this Union see how the analogy fades out. To-day we have 45 great States. They are wealthy and powerful and independent; they have no occasion to fear any power on this earth; their flag is honored and respected wherever it flies. Is there any emergency at this time which dictates as a matter of prudence the bringing in of additional States into this Union? Manifestly not. No such suggestion has been made in this debate, nor will be, that the Union, the Government, has any reason, prudential or otherwise, for bringing these Territories into the galaxy of States at this time. It is simply a question of doing justice to those communities that are demanding admission; nothing more.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I listened with interest to what the Senator had to say about the ordinance of 1787, and I thought perhaps he was going to pursue the subject further. If not, I wish to call his attention to the fact that those Senators who have thus far spoken on this side with respect to that ordinance do not contend, of course, that the ordinance should apply now. We merely cite that as we cite the rule of the unit of representation or any other rule to show that a Territory, while it is not contended that it should have any specific number, should have a fair proportion in comparison with the rest of the country. That was the force of our suggestion and the extent to which it went.

Mr. QUARLES. I appreciate and understand the purposes for which the committee dealt with the ordinance, but I inferred from the long and brilliant argument made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] that he went further than the committee; first assuming to criticise the interpretation of the ordinance made by the committee, and that he intended his argument to proceed a step further and to throw light upon the present contention by reason of the fact that States have so recently been admitted having only 60,000 inhabitants, maintaining that right under the ordinance of 1787, as it has been extended.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is correct.

Mr. QUARLES. And it has been extended further than has been suggested in this argument. If it were necessary, I could call attention to a statute that has been overlooked in this debate, which extended the doctrines and provisions of the ordinance of 1787 over the Dakotas. But it is quite immaterial to refer to that, because the Dakotas had an abundant population to admit them upon any principle without the invocation of any special rule.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] proceeded further and reviewed the admission of certain other States which were admitted during the war period or shortly afterwards, and he admitted himself, as of course everyone knows, that there was then another emergency pressing upon this nation, an emergency to have a certain number of States in order to effectuate what was known as the war policy or the policy of reconstruction.

I say, Mr. President, there is no analogy whatever to be drawn from the fact of the admission of that group of States, because there, as in the case of the early States, the acts of admission were dictated by an imperative emergency, and it was thought that the emergency was such as to warrant the admission of those States even though the population was below the number which ordinarily would be required to equip a Territory for statehood.

Mr. President, the learned Senator from Ohio proceeds to build up what he calls a rule, and I wish to address myself to it for a moment. If I understand his argument, it was something like this: After the rule of the ordinance of 1787 had passed away there was, by some common consent, a new rule, namely, that the population which was equal to the ratio of representation should be the test of admission. If I were arguing from his premises I should evolve a rule exactly opposite to that arrived at by the Senator from Ohio.

It will be noted that the Ordinance of 1787 fixed a maximum number. Discretion operated below that maximum of 60,000. The more recent authorities that he produces would seem to fix the minimum as the ratio of representation, and discretion may be exercised above the minimum and not below it. That is to say, that a Territory to be eligible for consideration must have at least the number of people that would admit them to representation in the lower House, and the zone of discretion is reached when you get above that number.

But he has formulated a convenient rule—a rule exactly adapted to the emergency of his argument. It makes the number of the ratio of representation a maximum which entitles to representation, and, to use his language, "New Mexico is entitled to representation," while Arizona, with less than the requisite population, is entitled to the tender consideration and discretion of Congress. No such rule is recognized by any law, ordinance, or treaty. It is supposed to have sprung out of a consensus of opinion, or unwritten tradition, if you please. The current of opinion, as I gather it from these sources, is entirely different from that stated by the Senator from Ohio. It requires a Territory to show that she has people enough to entitle her to representation as a condition precedent. So far as this question is one of representation, that is a logical position.

But, Mr. President, the question we are discussing here is not confined to or limited by the rule of representation. That is but one element of it. There are other considerations besides the numerical strength of the population. When a Territory has made itself eligible by showing that it has enough people to entitle it to representation, then begin the inquiries: first, whether the people are sufficiently advanced in education and in civilization to entitle them to stand upon an equal footing with the other States; secondly, whether the territory occupied by them has resources sufficient for all time to maintain that population. For instance, a mining craze in Arizona might have brought into that Territory for the time being a population sufficient to equal the ratio of representation. But on examination we might find that the mines were liable to fail; that there were no other resources to maintain so large a population, and in a short time a general exodus might be expected. The discretion of Congress would therefore be invoked to determine whether, under all the circumstances, notwithstanding the presence of a sufficient number of people, it would be wise to admit the Territory as a State. No, Mr. President, there is no rule which makes the number of people the sole or conclusive test.

TREATY OF GUADALUPE-HIDALGO.

The Senator argues that there is some moral obligation resting upon us in this case growing out of the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo. I can not agree with the distinguished Senator in that respect, although I make the assertion with diffidence, owing to his great legal ability. The first proposition I would suggest is this: The Constitution confers upon Congress, without limitation, the discretion to admit new States. Can that discretion be bargained away by the treaty-making power? Can the treaty-making power enter into a compact with Mexico to deprive us of that constitutional discretion? Mr. President, it seems to me that the statement of the proposition is its own refutation. That discretion was not impaired one iota by that convention with Mexico. Unlike the Ordinance of 1787, that treaty was a compact with another sovereign and not with the people. Mexico could enforce, perhaps, against us, that treaty, but we have made no compact with the people who inhabit that Territory as we had with the people of the Northwest Territory.

Let us examine the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo. It does not, by its terms, assume to impair our legislative discretion. The Senator speaks often of the parenthetical clause wherein occurs an express recognition of our discretion. Suppose that parenthetical clause were stricken out, would it change the reading or the meaning of that treaty? It would then stand merely stipulating that those Territories are to be admitted into the Union "at the proper time." Strike out the parenthesis, and who would determine when the proper time had arrived?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Or even strike out "the proper time.'

Mr. QUARLES. Or, as the Senator from Indiana says, go further and strike out the clause regarding the proper time. To what power would the question be referred? Manifestly to Congress. But, Mr. President, it is idle to discuss that question, because the parenthetical clause was added, the words "proper time" were employed, referring distinctly to the discretion of Congress.

But the Senator makes an argument on the meaning of the other phrase—"the principles of the Constitution"—and, if I understood his argument, it was that "the principles of the Constitution" indicated the presence in a Territory of a number of people equal to the ratio of representation. I can not agree with the Senator there. The principles of the Constitution referred to in that treaty were two: First, that there should be found in that Territory a republican form of government, and secondly, that the admission should be conformable to the discretion of Congress, with whom alone it is lodged by the Constitution. Those are the only two references in the Constitution to this subject, and presumably the only ones to which reference was made by the diplomats who framed that treaty.

So we come back again to the same proposition, that the integrity of legislative discretion on this question has never been impeached or impaired. Statehood is here to-day as an original question. It stands here to-day free from any emergency or exigency that should constrain our action. We stand here bound to exercise our discretion wisely in view of all the facts and circumstances that are brought to our attention.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I dislike very much to interrupt the Senator, because his succession of points is very clear, but with his permission I will say that I was particularly struck by what the Senator said about the fact that the provisions of the Constitution giving Congress the power, the discretion, to say when a Territory shall be admitted could neither be added to nor subtracted from by the provision of any treaty or the omission to put any provision in any treaty; and that even if the words "proper time" and the parenthetical clause "to be judged of by Congress" had been left out of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the same power would be there and the same limitation would be there, because the Constitution would be read into the treaty, of course.

Mr. QUARLES. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, then, that being true, and all lawyers and everybody else will admit it, is it not a significant fact, a fact which requires our particular attention, why it was put in by the drafters of that treaty? They knew all those things, nevertheless they inserted those words, which from a legal point of view were unnecessary. There must have been some reason for that, and that is emphasized by the further fact that that language has never occurred in any other treaty adopted before or since. It is only with reference to New Mexico and Arizona and the territory we acquired from Mexico that there were inserted the words "at the proper time, to be judged of by Congress." The fact that they did that, from a legal view unnecessary, and did a thing which never has been done in any treaty before or since, suggests that there must have been some very conspicuous reason before those who drew that convention, and that reason no doubt exists to-day.

Mr. QUARLES. I am very thankful to my friend for having made that suggestion, and I do not feel at all at a loss to understand the motive which prompted the inclusion of that language. There could have been no other, except overcautiousness on the part of the people who were negotiating that treaty, to make sure that the discretion of Congress should be unimpaired whenever the question of admitting those Territories arose; and it was wisely done, for now there can be no question as to the proper interpretation of the treaty, and no room within its four corners for such a rule as the Senator from Ohio laid down.

CAPACITY FOR STATEHOOD.

Mr. President, there is one proposition touching the fitness of these Territories which has not been specifically referred to in this debate, to which I wish to make reference for a moment. With great pains the statistics have been tabulated by the several Senators who have spoken upon this question. We know exactly the rate of illiteracy in these Territories. We know the number of foreign born. We know all about the resources of agriculture and grazing and mining, and I shall not detain the Senate a moment to go into any of those questions. But I do beg to refer to one argument, based upon the showing of the census, which has not been adverted to. The ratio of illiteracy in both Territories is startling. No right-minded man can contemplate with any satisfaction the bringing in of a population where the ratio of illiteracy is so high.

But there is another thing which is even more suggestive than the tables of illiteracy, and that is that in New Mexico among the native-born population the percentage of illiteracy is 51. I want every Senator to think for a moment what that means. Among the native-born population, those who have been born under our institutions and under our flag, the ratio of illiteracy is 51 per cent. That is a most alarming suggestion.

We know what our institutions have done for peoples of other races; we know what an inspiration they have been to the sturdy immigrants who have come to our shores, and still in one of our own Territories that is asking to come in as a sovereign State on an equal footing we find that alarming state of facts. "By their fruits ye shall know them" is a maxim as true to-day as it was when first uttered. And that civilization, existing there for half a century under our institutions, produces 51 per cent of illiteracy!

Sir, in the State from which I come we have a large proportion of foreign population—not only the Germans, but the Scandinavians, the Poles, and an admixture of other foreign elements. But we have noticed all through that the second generation, coming under the beneficent influence of our school system, are not only Americans, but the most intense Americans we have. Take the Germans, for instance. They speak our language; they sympathize with our ideas; they adopt our methods; they are imbued with our enthusiasm, and they are the most stalwart Americans you can find. It is much the same with all those other nationalities; and while the number of foreign born has been very large, such a thing as an interpreter in a jury room has never been heard of. They become the best of citizens. They are patriotic, public spirited, thrifty, and in every respect have become assimilated with our population.

I have not heard any reference made in this debate to a singular circumstance, and that is that the subcommittee had before it a number of justices of the peace in New Mexico, many of whom were native born; and in one instance an interpreter was required for a justice of the peace who appeared before the committee. Although he had been produced right there, he could not speak the language of the country. Now, presumably, that man was above the level of the intelligence of the community in which he lived, because he had been selected to judge and arbitrate the disputes of his neighbors.

The committee had before it another justice of the peace who was also native born. They asked him what is the Constitution of the United States. He said he had never read it except only a fragment or a clause, which he had seen printed in Spanish. The question was still pressed, and he said it was something out of which had come the laws of New Mexico.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Another justice of the peace who was asked that question said he had not read it at all. The Senator referred to the fact that for one justice of the peace an interpreter was required. I think, perhaps, that was the case in more than one instance; certainly in most of the instances there was broken speech. The interpreter was not recorded as being used where it was at all possible to understand the witness. Further, in every instance, possibly with one exception and I believe in every instance, the testimony shows that the dockets of the justices of the peace were written in Spanish and the processes issued from their offices in Spanish.

I wish to call the Senator's attention to another fact, because I see he has passed the point, and that is with respect to his statement concerning the illiteracy of the native-born element, because it astonished me, and I have given some attention to this subject. Do I understand the Senator to say that the illiteracy of the native-born element is 51 per cent?

Mr. QUARLES. Yes, sir; it is so shown by the census.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The significance of that fact, serious as it is, does not, I think, appear fully upon its face. Illiteracy is determined by the following test: Can you read or write any language? And 51 per cent, as the Senator states—and it astonishes me; it is an alarming state—of the native-born element can not read or write the English language or any other language. If the test were applied to the reading and writing of English, how much higher does the Senator think it would be?

Mr. QUARLES. I have no idea.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But necessarily it would be very much higher.

Mr. QUARLES. This statement would excite great surprise in the mind of any person not familiar with the environments under which those people live. The subcommittee, I venture to say, visited the cities. Now, the urban population in these Territories is quite different from the rustic population. The people of the cities are, of course, all the time brought in contact with the business element, with the life of commerce, and those people become bright and energetic. But anyone who has visited that Territory, and especially if he has had the opportunity of traveling in old Mexico, will have no difficulty in understanding the situation. It is natural and it is logical.

Now, great wonder is expressed that forty years elapsed before it occurred to these people in New Mexico that a system of schools was necessary. That would be a monstrous proposition as applied to almost any other of our new communities. Take the case of Wisconsin, for instance. The old frontiersmen, who were hewing down the trees and building their log cabins, made it their business in the first instance to discuss the question of education, and the first graded school of the West was established in the little town where I was born while it was yet a wilderness. But those people down there in New Mexico, as I said, lived for forty years under American institutions before the necessity of a school system became apparent. Now, why is that? It is perfectly natural to one who understands the situation.

A plaza either in old Mexico or in New Mexico is a menace to civilization. It brings isolation. A plaza surrounded by adobe buildings will shelter a dozen or twenty families, as the case may be. There they live in complete isolation. They reproduce the original type. They think the same thoughts and they sing the same songs as their fathers had for centuries before. They follow the goats through the chaparral and sagebrush during the day. They return to the plaza at night and indulge in the same games and pastimes that diverted their ancestors before them.

Now, Mr. President, while civilization is infectious, those little communities are immune. Civilization never reaches them. There they have lived generation after generation as a pastoral people. Their wants are few and simple. The climate is mild. They do not have to hustle to keep warm. They have fruit and they can provide themselves with the necessaries of life without great exertion. There they have lived, I say, without feeling a throb of commerce or civilization. The need of education does not appeal to them. Until the plaza is invaded you will have no progress among those people.

In the cities of New Mexico, we are advised that their system of schools is admirable. We see the enrollment of pupils, and it is large. We see that improvement is going on. But when you go back to the plaza you will find nothing of the kind. How it may be now, since this impulse of education has aroused to some extent the lethargies of the people, I do not know.

When Cortez approached the palace of the Montezumas to deliver the message of his august sovereign, Spain was a great power. Her infantry was renowned throughout the world. Her armadas struck terror to the nations of Europe. She was a dominating influence in European politics. The wealth of her colonies was poured into her lap. She was enamored of luxury. And what did she do? She drove the Moors and the Moriscos from her borders, and they were her artisans. The sound of the harumer was discordant. Industry was something vulgar, not to be encouraged or tolerated. So the artisans, the working people, were made exiles by Spain, and from that time dates her decadence. We find that her colonies one after another have revolted and established their independence. It became the mission of this young nation to intervene and relax her nerveless hand from the last of her western possessions.

As illustrative of this tendency toward decadence we find the Cortes of Spain, the legislative assembly, appealing to Philip the Second to forbid the use of coaches, because, forsooth, the Spanish people had gotten along so well without them for so many years. Now, poor old Spain, reduced to a second-rate power, has retired within her own boundaries to reflect upon the uncertainties of human greatness. Wherever her children are, wherever you find the Spanish blood, you find that this racial infirmity has been inherited; and in the plaza in New Mexico, as in old Mexico, the watchwords of that laggard civilization are "mañana" and "poco tiempo."

Now, Mr. President, let us wait. Let us wait until education has permeated those rustic communities. Let us pause until we have aroused in their breasts the American initiative. Let us wait until they are capable of sympathizing with our civilization, willing to adopt our methods, our habits, our language, before we admit them as a sovereign State.

A WILDERNESS IF IRRIGATION FAILS.

Mr. President, there is another reason that I want to urge upon the Senate why these two Territories ought not to be admitted, and it is a reason which has not been offered by anybody, and I esteem it worthy of attention. What will be the future of Arizona and New Mexico if irrigation fails? That region will relapse into a wilderness.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the legal situation which now exists with reference to irrigation. Let me say at the outset that it seems to me the United States Government is undertaking to carry out two antagonistic policies. Its officers are working at cross-purposes. In Congress we are trying to mature and carry out a great scheme of irrigation. We have passed a bill with this end in view. But at the same time the officers of the United States Government in the courts are seeking to establish a principle which is a menace to any Federal system of irrigation.

It is well known that New Mexico must depend upon the Rio Grande and the Pecos for its irrigation. It is well known that both of those streams are interstate streams. It is known that a large quantity of the water in those two streams has already been appropriated, so that the Rio Grande River at times, at El Paso, runs dry.

Now, the Rio Grande is not only an interstate stream, but it is an international stream. It passes on, as everyone knows, into the Republic of Mexico. So the question raised by the law officers of the United States Government is one of very great importance as to the future of this country—whether this appropriation of water is to be permitted if it threatens the navigability of the Rio Grande River. I think it is not generally known that the Supreme Court of the United States, in considering this question, has given an intimation which at least is startling in its bearing upon the future of these two Territories.

There was a dam projected on the Rio Grande River for irrigation purposes, and the officers of the United States Government brought suit to enjoin the building of that dam on the theory that navigation would be affected by the diversion of water for irrigation. That dam was intended to store the flood waters of the river in New Mexico. A preliminary injunction was issued. The lower court dismissed the bill on the ground that the Rio Grande River was not navigable in New Mexico, and therefore the bill had no equity. The case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there the whole question was considered.

I will pause only long enough to say to those who may not have investigated the subject that the common-law rule requires that a river passing my land, for instance, shall be permitted to run as by nature it would run. The upper proprietor may use the water as it passes him, but he must return it into the stream, so that the volume of the river shall not be substantially diminished when it passes my land.

Now, that common-law rule has been entirely abrogated in the States of Colorado, California, and in most of the Western States. It has given place to another rule, which gives priority of right to priority of appropriation. The doctrine of riparian rights under the common law has been abrogated.

Congress has recognized the local abrogation of the common-law rule in many statutes and in a number of decisions, and it was supposed by the profession generally, I think, that that recognition by Congress and its courts was all sufficient to do away with the common-law rule on that subject, as applied to that whole region.

Now, you see at once that if the common-law rule were to be applied to the Rio Grande and the Pecos it would simply destroy irrigation, because when they take water out of a river in that arid country the evaporation is something enormous, I think about 30 per cent, if I remember. I may be in error.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I should like——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is making a very interesting statement, and I wish to ask him if he understands that the doctrine known as the "common-law doctrine" applies to irrigation?

Mr. QUARLES. Yes, sir; and I shall show that the Supreme Court does apply it. I will hear the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator that he has overestimated the amount of evaporation. It is not to exceed from 12½ to 15 per cent.

Mr. QUARLES. I am thankful for the suggestion. I do not pretend to be an expert upon this subject.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the case to which I have referred. It is found in 178 United States and is the case of United States v. Rio Grande Irrigation Company.

I will read briefly from page 704. The court said:

> Notwithstanding the unquestioned rule of the common law in reference to the right of a lower riparian proprietor to insist upon the continuous flow of the stream as it was, and although there has been in all the Western States an adoption or recognition of the common law, it was early developed in their history that the mining industry in certain States, the reclamation of arid lands in others, compelled a departure from the common-law rule, and justified an appropriation of flowing waters both for mining purposes and for the reclamation of arid lands, and there has come to be recognized in those States, by custom and by State legislation, a different rule—a rule which permits under certain circumstances, the appropriation of the waters of a flowing stream for other than domestic purposes. So far as those rules have only a local significance, and affect only questions between citizens of the State, nothing is presented which calls for any consideration by the Federal courts.

Then they speak of an act passed by Congress which recognized by express terms that doctrine of the prior appropriation of water, the prior proprietor having the better right. The court says:

> The effect of this statute was to recognize, so far as the United States are concerned, the validity of the local customs, laws, and decisions of courts in respect to the appropriation of water.

Then they go on and speak of the desert-land act, which I need not read. It is familiar to most Senators. Then they speak of several other acts, and on page 706 the court says:

> Obviously by these acts, so far as they extended, Congress recognized and assented to the appropriation of water in contravention of the common-law rule as to continuous flow. To infer therefrom that Congress intended to release its control over the navigable streams of the country and to grant in aid of mining industries and the reclamation of arid lands the right to appropriate the waters on the sources of navigable streams to such an extent as to destroy their navigability, is to carry those statutes beyond what their fair import permits. This legislation must be interpreted in the light of existing facts—that all through this mining region in the West were streams, not navigable, whose waters could safely be appropriated for mining and agricultural industries, without serious interference with the navigability of the rivers into which those waters flow. And in reference to all these cases of purely local interest the obvious purpose of Congress was to give its assent, so far as the public lands were concerned, to any system, although in contravention to the common-law rule, which permitted appropriation of those waters for legitimate industries. To hold that Congress, by these acts, meant to confer upon any State the right to appropriate all the waters of the tributary streams which unite into a navigable water course, and so destroy the navigability of that water course in derogation of the interests of all the people of the United States, is a construction which can not be tolerated.

I will not detain the Senate to read this opinion further, but the court goes on and holds that the lower court was in error in dismissing the bill on the ground that the Rio Grande was not navigable in New Mexico. They hold that, if the appropriation of the water in New Mexico affected the navigability of the river in another State, then it makes no difference whether the river was navigable in New Mexico or not.

This case was again before the court in 184 United States, but it is not particularly significant, except that the language employed by the court would seem to indicate that this is regarded as a most important and dangerous question. This case is still pending, and testimony is being taken to determine to what extent the appropriation of the water of the Rio Grande River for the purposes of reclamation is interfering with the navigability of the stream lower down. Any Senator who will read that opinion will, I think, see that there is very grave danger that they may eventually apply the common-law rule with all that that implies.

But that is not all, Mr. President. The case I have just called attention to proceeded upon the doctrine of navigability. The same proposition has been raised in another way in a case that is reported in 185 United States, the case of Kansas v. Colorado. There the question of navigability was not raised. There the question presented by the bill was whether Colorado could appropriate the water of the Arkansas River while it was running within the Colorado boundaries, and thus deprive the people of Kansas, through which State the river runs, from the advantageous use of water for domestic and other purposes as well as for irrigation, presenting the sole, simple question as to the right of one State to appropriate the water of an interstate stream, leaving out the question of navigability.

There was a demurrer interposed to that bill; and every lawyer knows that a demurrer admits all the facts that are well pleaded, and the court might have proceeded to a decree determining all these questions upon that demurrer.

The Supreme Court, however, regarding the question as so difficult and so important, declined to pass upon the demurrer, and sent the case back to have the evidence taken (and that court takes original jurisdiction in that case), so that that court might know what the very facts were, as to the extent to which the Colorado people had been appropriating that water, to what extent it influenced the underflow, which is a feature of that water course in Kansas, and all the other facts, considering it a question of such great importance as to whether the common-law rule should be applied that the court has thus asked to have the demurrer withdrawn and all the facts presented before that court.

Now, without wearying the Senate further I wish to ask here, in view of the inevitable result that must flow from the application of the common-law doctrine to those two streams, ought we to admit that Territory with that menace hanging over it? Ought we not to wait until we know what the law is, affecting, as it does, the resources and almost the very life of those two Territories? If we admit them, our act is irrevocable; it can not be reviewed or recalled. Is there a Senator here who, in view of that litigation, in view of that great danger imperiling, as it does, the industries of those two Territories, would wish to say that they should be admitted as sovereign States before the court has determined this great fundamental question?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. QUARLES. With pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me the Senator is assuming what is not a fact, that the Rio Grande is within the legal term a navigable stream, and that he is putting up a bugbear that will never rise to trouble us or anyone else. That stream is not navigable, has never been navigable to any commercial extent, and never will be.

Mr. QUARLES. Does the Senator mean that the Rio Grande is not navigable at any point?

Mr. TELLER. I mean that for a few months in the year the lower end of the stream is navigable, during which time little one-horse steamboats occasionally run upon it; but there is practically no commerce on that river, and there never has been.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I can only say that if I am making a bugbear of this question, I am imitating the Supreme Court of the United States, which seems to be very much disturbed by that same bugbear.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say that the Supreme Court had some evidence, at which I am astonished, to the effect that the river was navigable not only at its mouth, but in New Mexico. It never has been so. There never has been in the history of the river a boat which has passed El Paso. There never has been a steamship or a sailboat on the river above that point.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I can not follow the distinguished Senator from Colorado into that matter of fact, concerning which I am entirely ignorant.

Mr. SPOONER. I will ask my colleague if he assents to the definition of navigability suggested by the Senator from Colorado, that that is only a navigable stream within the meaning of the law which can float a 1-horse, a 2-horse, or a 10-horse steamboat, or whether, if a stream is navigable for any of the useful purposes of commerce, such even as the floating of logs to market, that does not constitute navigability within the American rule?

Mr. TELLER. I should like to reply to that if the other Senator from Wisconsin will allow me just one minute.

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. It can not possibly be assumed by the Senator from Wisconsin or anybody else——

Mr. SPOONER. I do not assume anything——

Mr. TELLER. That the Congress of the United States is going to declare a river a navigable stream if you can run posts or logs down it, and thus deprive a half million people at the head of the stream of the right to live there at all. We are treating this matter as a practical thing. The Senator says there will be danger some day that the people at the head of that stream and along the borders of the stream will be deprived of water for domestic use in agriculture—that they will be without it in order that somebody may run a saw log down the river.

Mr. SPOONER. I assume nothing except this——

Mr. TELLER. I think you do.

Mr. SPOONER. I think I did not. I only stated a proposition of law. The common-law rule of navigability is the ebb and flow of the tide. The American rule of navigability is not the ebb and flow of the tide, but it is the susceptibility of a stream for some of the useful purposes of commerce, and that does not involve steamboat navigation; but whether a stream is conceded to be navigable under the American rule, independent of the act of Congress declaring it navigable or otherwise, is a question of law and of water rights.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; I understand that.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not assumed anything contrary to that.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator assumes that a stream might be navigable because posts and logs could be run down it. I do not concede that to be a fact. There may be somewhere in Wisconsin decisions holding that streams are navigable where posts and logs are run down them.

Mr. SPOONER. When the Senator says that he indicates forgetfulness of the scope of the decisions on that subject.

Mr. TELLER. I have never looked to see what the decisions were.

Mr. SPOONER. I was not referring to any Wisconsin decision.

Mr. TELLER. I know the rule as to navigable streams where the Government of the United States interferes with and takes charge of them is that they are considered navigable when boats can be run upon them. I do not believe that the Government has ever taken charge of any other streams.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. I surrender to my colleague for the time.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, in the case of Kansas v. Colorado the question of navigability is entirely left out of view by the court, and still the question raised was held by the court to be so important that they sent the case back to take proof. Here is what the court says; let us see if there is any bugbear in this:

> We think proof should be made as to whether Colorado is herself actually threatening to wholly exhaust the flow of the Arkansas River in Kansas; whether what is described in the bill as the "underflow" is a subterranean stream flowing in a known and defined channel, and not merely water percolating through the strata below; whether certain persons, firms, and corporations in Colorado must be made parties hereto; what lands in Kansas are actually situated on the banks of the river, and what, either in Colorado or Kansas, are absolutely dependent on water therefrom; the extent of the watershed or the drainage area of the Arkansas River; the possibilities of the maintenance of a sustained flow through the control of flood waters; in short, the circumstances, a variation in which might induce the court to either grant, modify, or deny the relief sought or any part thereof.

If I understand that language, it means that if the proof is strong enough, the court proposes to deal with the case according to the principles of common law, but it hesitates until the very facts can be presented in the record, not with reference to navigability, but with reference to the right of one State to appropriate and use all the waters in the stream, and thereby deprive the adjoining State of the use of the same for domestic and other purposes. The distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] will not, I think, say there is any bugbear there. It seems to me to be a menace, and it seems to go right to the very root of this whole question,

Mr. President, is any great interest to be sacrificed, is any right to be infringed. if we wait until we know what the highest court in the land shall say upon this subject? It seems to me, sir, that we are constrained by every principle of prudence to wait until we know what the court shall hold, not only as to the possibility of future irrigation, but as to the permanence of the system so far as it has already been established.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator spoke about the streams in New Mexico and Arizona. To what streams did the Senator refer that might be affected by this legislation?

Mr. QUARLES. The Rio Grande and the Pecos, both interstate streams.

Mr. BURTON. Is the Senator disturbed about any opinion of the Supreme Court affecting the waters of those streams so as to affect the development of either Arizona or New Mexico?

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator will allow me another word—surely there can be no reason for urging that as an argument against this bill.

There is one thing while I am on my feet, if the Senator will allow me, that I wish to say, and that is water is never lost by taking it out of a stream and putting it on the land. Take a thousand cubic feet of water out of a stream and put it on the land and it will find its way back to the channel again with no diminution at all. The Senator will recognize that fact if he is familiar with the subject of irrigation.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I do not profess to be informed in regard to details of irrigation, but I do know that on the Gila River there was a band of Indians who had always had an abundance of water to carry on irrigation who were compelled to come before our committee and ask for aid because the appropriation of the waters of the Gila River farther up the stream had absolutely deprived them of water. Does not the Senator know that the water of the Gila River and its tributaries is almost entirely appropriated in Arizona and consumed right there in irrigation? The allegations in the verified bill in the case of Kansas v. Colorado are that in the State of Colorado the waters have been appropriated to such an extent that the river ceases to flow through Kansas, although in all the years before there had been an abundant flow. I refer my distinguished friend to authoritative instances of that kind rather than to assert any opinion of my own.

Mr. BURTON. The cases which the Senator has cited are not authoritative at all. There is no such thing as the loss of water by its appropriation for irrigation if you will wait long enough for the water to percolate through the ground back again into the stream.

I hesitate to speak about the case that is pending between Colorado and Kansas; but it is not brought by irrigationists; it is brought by lawyers. The fact about the matter is that every single drop of water taken out by the ditches in Colorado will get back into the stream in Kansas, whether there is ever any case tried or not. Take 1,000 or 10,000 cubic feet of water out of the stream, say at Pueblo or at Rockyford, or any place between Pueblo and the State line, spread that water over the country, and in the course of a few years it finds its way back into the channel, and there will be just as much water in Kansas as there was before a drop was taken out.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, in answer to the remark of my friend the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] that in the course of a few years the water will seep back into the channel, I ask him what would become of the lands lying around the channel where it was dry?

Mr. BURTON. The lands would be there. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The lands certainly would.

Mr. BURTON. They will not get away. If the water was on the land before the ditches were built in Colorado, the water can not be taken out at all under existing law. For instance, if a ditch is built and it appropriates the water, enough of the water must be permitted to go down the channel to be used by the ditch first built. That is the law everywhere.

The suit referred to was brought upon the idea that all the water could be appropriated above and thus deplete the stream below it. That is the basis of the fallacy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am not talking about the suit; I am talking about the Senator's fallacy, because I think it is the Senator's fallacy and not the fallacy of the conclusion drawn by the Senator from Wisconsin. Now, the Senator from Kansas says that if water is taken out of a stream, no matter how much, for irrigation it is not lost. That is a good deal like saying that force is never lost. Of course it is never lost, because it goes some place else; but it is lost for available use. The Senator states that if water is taken out of a stream so that the channel below is dry, in the course of a few years it will seep back into the channel. The Senator means us to understand that the water is not lost. Of course not; it goes some place; but what becomes of the land that was under cultivation, which lies along the stream, when the stream becomes dry? That is the question.

The Senator from Wisconsin has read authorities which the Senator from Kansas says are not authoritative. I submit that is a question of opinion. It occurs to me that they are authoritative, and he will permit me to give one more. When the subcommittee was at Phoenix we found that the irrigation channel had taken a large volume of water from Salt River some miles above the city, and that the stream opposite the city was therefore totally dry. That is a very familiar experience, I am told, in those regions. So that, outside of the theory of the nonloss of water, like the theory of the nonloss of force, is the practical matter that when you divert from the channel of the stream enough water for irrigation, or any other purpose, you use it up and, of course, the channel below is dry; and to say that it seeps back is a good deal like saying that if you drew off all the water there was in a well you would not pump the well dry, because in time it would seep back. Nobody contends that water is lost or destroyed any more than anybody contends that force is destroyed. It has gone somewhere else—that is the trouble.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I do not pretend to be an expert on irrigation, but I had always supposed that it was an elementary principle of physics that if water were poured on a hot stove evaporation would result. I think I can not be mistaken about that simple proposition. If you turn a stream of water into the hot sands is not evaporation enormously increased at once?

Mr. BURTON. Evaporation is so small that it is not appreciable. In any of the canals that have been built the loss of water by evaporation is so small that it is not measurable at all. The streams that were dry, of which the Senator spoke, were in that condition because the water had been recently taken out above. In the course of a short time, in a few years, the same water that is taken out and spread upon the land gets back into the channel again. That is the point I was trying to make. The loss by evaporation in irrigation amounts to nothing. It is so small that it is not counted at all.

Mr. QUARLES. I wish that the distinguished Senator had been in the Senate when another distinguished Senator from the West [Mr. TELLER], presumably familiar with this subject, announced here this afternoon that the evaporation by reason of irrigation amounted to 12½ to 15 per cent. It seems to me that is quite an appreciable amount, and I would advise my distinguished friend from Kansas, if he is candid in his view, to make haste to get into the Supreme Court and convince them of this doctrine rather than to discuss it here.

Mr. BURTON. There is little danger of any harm coming from the decision of the Supreme Court when the facts are finally presented in regard to this matter. There is nobody being hurt by it now. I will say to the Senator that, in my opinion, the loss—I will repeat it again—the loss of water by irrigation is only temporary; it gets back to the channel.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I have been speaking already longer than I intended. I am somewhat weary and I should be glad to yield the floor at this time and resume to-morrow.

Mr. SPOONER. Would my colleague prefer to discontinue his speech at this time until to-morrow?

Mr. QUARLES. I would much prefer it, if that is agreeable to the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. Where is the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will occupy a few moments of time, with the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no doubt the Senator from Pennsylvania will consent to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair at this time will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

STATEHOOD AMENDMENTS.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I should be glad to know what became of the reports made from my committee a few days ago?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are on the Calendar.

Mr. QUAY. I think they had better take the ordinary reference. I do not see any objection to such a course, and I will ask that they be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They can not be taken up without calling them from the Calendar.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is the request?

Mr. QUAY. That the reports made from my committee a few days ago shall be referred in accordance with the request of the committee. It is a matter of indifference, but they ought to be disposed of.

Mr. SPOONER. From what committee were they reported?

Mr. QUAY. From the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the nature of the report?

Mr. QUAY. It is the report on the statehood bill. The reference, of course, amounts to nothing under the circumstances, but I think the reports ought to be referred to the proper committee, or else a precedent will be established that may be troublesome in the future.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They can only be taken from the Calendar by motion.

Mr. QUAY. Then I move that they be taken up.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is not necessary, because there is not going to be any objection.

Mr. QUAY. They will have to be taken up anyway.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is not going to be any objection to their being referred as the Senator requests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that Calendar No. 2703, being an amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill, providing for the admission of the Territories of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico into the Union as States, be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and that Calendar No. 2704, being an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill, providing for the admission of the Territories of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico into the Union as States, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want merely to say in that connection that it will be admitted by every person, no matter what his views may be as to the merits of this measure, that this is an extraordinary procedure. It requires something to be done right now in an unusual method, and therefore it is proper to call attention to what is required to be done in this method of proposed attachment to an appropriation bill.

The first thing we see is that it is proposed not only to put onto an appropriation bill a bill having nothing to do with appropriations, but to put onto such a bill a thing which never can be undone if enacted into law. In that respect it differs from everything else. It is serious, far-reaching, irrevocable. Is there an emergency—and I am not going to argue the matter; I am merely calling the attention of the Senate to it at this time—before the Senate for such an unusual method in such a hurry? Not only is it everlasting in its consequences, not only does it forever affect the Republic, but there is earnest, determined difference of opin ion upon it. Should such a measure be rushed in this revolutionary way?

As I said, I will make no objection to the reference of this amendment now, but this is a large general subject, and I have no doubt that at the proper time it will be discussed to the satisfaction of the Senator from Pennsylvania. But I thought it was proper at this juncture to call attention in a general way to just what is proposed.

Mr. QUAY. I merely wish to say, Mr. President, that the Senator is mistaken in saying the proceeding is unusual. The records of this Senate teem with precedents of this character.

S. R. 138. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for a life-size statue of Gen. Henry Leavenworth, at Leavenworth, Kans.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This brings up the special order, namely, the claims bills not disposed of. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the committee, in favor of the bills, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in opposition to them; and under the agreement there is ten minutes debate allowed on each side on each bill.

Mr. GRAFF. Will the bills be called up in the same order that they were the other day?

The SPEAKER. They will come up in their order.

ELEONORA G. GOLDSBOROUGH.

The first business was the bill (S. 3421) for the relief of Eleonora G. Goldsborough.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, Charles B. Goldsborough was a surgeon in the Marine-Hospital Service, and died on the 5th of January, 1890, in that service. So that the House will see that he was in the civil branch of the United States service. It is claimed that he died of blood poisoning growing out of an operation performed on a negro sailor in the summer of 1888, two years before his death. The only evidence there is upon this subject is the statement of Mrs. Goldsborough, the claimant, the widow of Dr. Goldsborough. Perhaps I ought to say that the bill provides that she shall receive two years' pay and extra allowance, amounting to $7,220, on account of his death. She states, referring to her husband:

While on duty in the city of Mobile he was desperately ill of malarial fever, and from there he was ordered to Chicago, the extreme cold of which, following upon the warmer temperature of Mobile, brought on a serious attack of rheumatism, from which he had not wholly recovered when he was again ordered to New Orleans. While engaged in the course of his duty he contracted blood poison in the performance of an operation, which also tended to undermine his health, and in April, 1889, he was again attacked by malarial fever, which his already weakened constitution was unable to withstand, and from which, together with the other complications, he eventually died.

There is also this statement from Dr. Ames, late passed assistant surgeon in the Marine-Hospital Service:

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., March 7, 1902.

I hereby certify that I attended Surg. Charles B. Goldsborough in the marine hospital, New Orleans, in November and December, 1889, and until his death, January 5, 1890. His death was due primarily to "blood poisoning," as manifested by the formation of abscesses and carbuncles.

While not personally cognizant of the fact, as I was not stationed in New Orleans at the time, I have frequently heard that Surgeon Goldsborough had been poisoned while operating upon a negro sailor in the summer of 1888.

Very respectfully,

R. P. M. AMES,
Late Passed Assistant Surgeon, M. H. S.

That is all the evidence in the case in regard to the blood poisoning, if that is a material factor in that respect to the Government. The committee say:

Upon the strength of this there can be no reasonable doubt that Surgeon Goldsborough's death was directly due to the effects of the operation in August, 1888.

The operation in August in which he was said to have contracted blood poisoning.

Now, the committee say there is one precedent for this bill:

It may be stated that a precedent for the bill now under consideration has been made by the act approved June 15, 1898, which granted the legal representatives of Asst. Surg. John W. Branham, of the Marine-Hospital Service, the amount of his salary and allowances for two years, Dr. Branham having died of yellow fever after serving about five months. Surgeon Goldsborough gave faithful service for twelve years.

The committee say:

The Branham case was an exceptional one. This case comes in the same class and is considered equally exceptional.

Your committee are of the opinion that Dr. Goldsborough died of an infectious disease acquired in the performance of his duty, and the bill is therefore returned with the recommendation that it pass when amended.

The bill is therefore reported with the recommendation to pass it as amended, and the amendments make an allowance for two years, amounting in all to $7,200.

Now, Mr. Speaker, of course all men wish to sympathize with the widow who has been bereft of her husband. I suppose there are hundreds of thousands, perhaps a million deserving widows in the United States who lost their husbands, many of them who have lost their husbands in the civil service, many of them who have lost their husbands because of disease contracted without doubt in the civil service and as a result of the civil service. But it has never been the policy of the Government of the United States to pension any person because of any disease or any other disability contracted in the civil service.

If this bill for Branham crept through the House at some time without its being noticed and without debate, or if it crept through the House at some time during a yellow fever excitement, because a man had braved death in taking care of a patient who was afflicted with that disease—that deadly disease, that infectious disease—it should furnish no precedent, Mr. Speaker, for the House in their opening up a new career of pensions; opening a different kind of pensions; to depart from the rule from the foundation of the Government, to pension only those in the military and naval service of the Government of the United States. Gentlemen may say, "Oh, this is only one case; we will not follow it with this class of cases." And yet the Branham case is made a precedent for this bill; and the next case that would come here would be fortified by the Branham case and the Goldsborough case; and yet we find there is not sufficient evidence in the case on which any man could say that this doctor died of blood poisoning superinduced by an operation performed upon a negro sailor two years before he died.

And yet this is the class of cases upon which the House is called upon to act. This is a precedent we are asked to make. I submit that gentlemen should stand up here and do justice to the United States, not simply deal out mercy or charity to a widow that happens to bring her claim to us. No man has the right in his representative capacity to put his hand into the Treasury of the United States and deal out charity to any of its citizens. He should rather dispense justice here, and when charity appeals put his hand in his own pocket, into his own personal treasury, and deal out charity to any who may come to us. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PAYNE. Very well.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would not this furnish a precedent to all persons in the employ of the Government and put them on the civil-pension list?

Mr. PAYNE. It certainly would tend in that direction.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he sits down.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is not what we are now doing under the civil-service rules that in part control the departments?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think we are.

Mr. HEPBURN. Are there not more than a thousand persons practically pensioned in the departments under the civil service?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think there are; but I do think there are men and women in the departments who are unfit to be there and who do not earn their salary.

Mr. HEPBURN. Would not that number be constantly increasing?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know; the gentleman is as good a prophet as I am. I call attention to the fact that that has not been done by an act of Congress, but by the departments keeping clerks there after they are unfit for service. I know the departments are weeding out of the service these people or putting them on a lower salary.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SCHIRM] who reported this bill.

Mr. SCHIRM. Mr. Speaker, it is refreshing undoubtedly to this House to listen to the leader on this side of the Chamber making a plea for justice and imputing motives to other members of this House in their position in support of this question. We are not attempting to put our hands into the Treasury of the United States to deal out pure and simple charity to anyone. We do believe, however, that the widow of this marine-hospital surgeon, Charles B. Goldsborough, is entitled to some consideration, because he lost his life as a direct result of his duties at the hospital.

I doubt not that on many occasions, if we are going into the sphere of the vague, as the gentleman from New York has done, that his vote will be found recorded on many questions that favored charitable claims coming from his own district and State when he did not go into his own pocket to deal out the charity. There is a precedent for this bill, and that precedent was made in 1898, when Assistant Surgeon Branham died as a result of his service in the pest hospital and his widow or legal representatives were given two years' salary with allowances. The gentleman from New York was a member of the House then. Perhaps he was not here when the bill was passed, and the fact that it escaped him induces him to say that it crept through or that "through some excitement as the result of the yellow fever in the South the hearts of men, being a little more touched with charity, allowed it to go through."

He had an opportunity to know that this bill was before the House then, and he made no objection. It is not fair to the rest of the members who did know that the bill was before the House that improper motives should be imputed to them by the leader on this side of the Chamber. The whole cry is that we are establishing a civil pension list. I was glad to receive the suggestion from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] on that line. We have, as a matter of fact, established a civil pension list. The great army of employees in Washington has among it many who ought to be dropped out, many who are useless to the Government, who are kept there through the charity of some people that have influence enough to control the powers that be.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not the duty of the head of every department to discharge every clerk under them that can not perform his duty; and are not the heads of the departments failing to perform their duty when they refuse to discharge incompetent persons?

Mr. SCHIRM. The question of unfitness of an employee is one of opinion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Maryland permit me a suggestion?

Mr. SCHIRM. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They can discharge them by having a lawsuit with every one of them and an appeal to a higher court to see whether the charges are true or false.

Mr. SCHIRM. Yes; it was for that reason that I made the remark that the matter of unfitness or fitness is one of opinion, and the heads of the departments are like all other human beings and subject to the charitable suggestions of gentlemen influential in this and other branches of the Government.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not the Democrats that were dropped, not Republicans, and no reason given for it?

Mr. SCHIRM. Well, they probably were incompetent. [Laughter.] I say it is a matter of opinion, and I see the gentleman from Texas is coming around to our way of thinking. From the question he put to the gentleman from New York I thought he was against us; now I think he is with us.

Mr. Speaker, it is not purely a matter of charity, and when the committees of the Senate and the House reported the Branham case they said:

> Your committee fearlessly blaze the way, as indicated in this report, because we think it an act of simple justice, and but poorly carrying out the implied obligation upon the Government to relieve the wants of the wife and children of one who heroically faced a danger fully equal to that encountered by the soldier in time of war.

To my mind there is very little difference between giving up your life upon the battlefield and giving it up in the hospital in this kind of dangerous work. It is well known that the service in the Marine Hospital is more dangerous than that performed by naval surgeons, and naval surgeons may be retired upon part pay, and in case of death a pension is provided for their families.

I believe that this case appeals to the justice of the House; and I rather apprehend from my short experience as a member of the Committee on Claims that there was a great deal of charity mingled with our decisions upon claims that were brought before us; for in but very few cases could we get absolute legal proof. We had to take some things for granted; and in most cases we gave the claimants the benefit of reasonable doubts. I do not believe that this House has reached the point where it will establish itself as an absolutely legal tribunal that will not grant anything to a claimant unless strict legal proof is brought, or unless the facts come within strict legal requirements. This is an appeal to justice, the charitable justice of this House. I leave it to the House for its decision.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, I feel called upon to endeavor so far as I can to correct perhaps some misapprehensions which may arise in regard to this bill. The applicant or claimant in this case is a lady residing in Maryland, who is absolutely penniless. As the report itself shows, after her husband's death she was left with some little property, but that property has been entirely expended or consumed, not through any fault of hers, but in order to maintain herself and her children.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York has dilated somewhat upon the subject of precedents in the House of Representatives. If I know anything about this House or have learned anything about it in the short time that I have had the honor of being a member, it is this, that the House of Representatives is the one body in the United States that is above and beyond precedent, that is controlled by no precedent, that makes its own precedents and follows only such precedents as it desires to follow. Mr. Speaker, this following of precedents, to begin with, is not always a very safe policy; because what is a safe precedent in one age or in one day would not be such in another age and another day.

This claim is a claim which, as my colleague from Maryland [Mr. SCHIRM] has said, appeals not only to the charity of this House, but to its sense of justice; and if precedents were needed in order to confirm the justice of this claim they could be found in this Congress and in every Congress which has preceded it for many years. Within my own recollection a bill was passed in this House appropriating a considerable sum of money to the family of a gentleman who lost his life by accidentally falling down an elevator shaft in the Post-Office Department building in this city.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. PEARRE. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the Chair must enforce the order of the House limiting debate on these bills to ten minutes on each side.

The question being taken on the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on ordering this Senate bill as amended to be read a third time.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 49, noes 67.

Mr. SCHIRM. I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (having counted the House). The count by the Chair discloses 178 members. A quorum is present.

Mr. SCHIRM. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 12 members voting in favor thereof.

So the House refused to order the bill to a third reading.

Mr. PAYNE. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH W. PARISH.

The next business in order was the bill (S. 475) to refer the claim of Joseph W. Parish to the Secretary of the Treasury for examination and payment of any balance found due.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering this bill to a third reading.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this case arises out of a contract made by the Government in 1863 with one Joseph W. Parish and another, whose name is not disclosed, for the delivery of ice——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. Near as I am to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], I can not hear what he is saying.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman from New York to repeat the date of this contract?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York will suspend until the House is in order. [A pause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, a contract was made in the spring of 1863 for the delivery of 30,000 tons of ice—5,000 at St. Louis, at $16 a ton; 5,000 at Cairo, at $20, a ton; 10,000 at Memphis, at $20 a ton, and 10,000 at Nashville, at $25 a ton. The whole purchase price was $630,000 for the ice. The ice was to be delivered in these localities. They did deliver under this contract 4,174 tons at St. Louis, 1,388 tons at Cairo, 6,456 tons at Memphis, and 750 tons at Nashville, and received therefor from the Government $228,914. The other 18,000 tons, or nearly 18,000 tons, were not delivered. The contract was made by an assistant surgeon-general. When the Surgeon-General heard of it he promptly told the assistant to suspend the contract. A notice was given to the contractor, which reached him on the 2d day of April, suspending the contract. In the meantime he had bought the ice. Ten thousand tons of it were bought at Lake Pepin, in Minnesota, and it does not appear where the balance of it was bought or what became of it. The 10,000 tons at Lake Pepin melted, were not delivered to the Government, and were a total loss.

After the war was over, and about 1882 or 1883, I think, Congress submitted the claim to the Court of Claims. There was a hearing had before the Court of Claims and the Court of Claims held that this assistant surgeon had no authority to make the contract, and decided in favor of the United States. They also made some findings of fact. The case then went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Government abandoned the idea that this assistant surgeon-general could not make the contract, said it was a valid contract, and then the question came as to the amount of damages this party was entitled to recover for the ice which had not been delivered. The Court of Claims found in their ninth finding of facts as follows:

> Said Parish was prepared and willing to deliver said 30,000 tons of ice in conformity with the conditions and obligations of the said contract and the terms of said letter of March 25, 1863, of which the defendants had notice, but they would not nor did receive more than the 12,768 tons aforesaid.

I can not quote as much as I would like to from the decision of the Supreme Court. This is the most important case that will come before this House this day, and I believe it is the most barefaced case that will come before this House to-day or, I hope, in some time. The court say:

> In point of fact, the order was never revoked, but suspended, so that the claimants could not tell whether it would be revoked or revived, and they never made or offered to make delivery of the amount demanded by that order. The Government did require, accept, and pay for part of it. The balance was never delivered or tendered.
> Without elaborating the matter, we are of opinion that as the claimants neither delivered or offered to deliver the remainder, they can not recover either the contract price or the profits they might have made if they had done so. And as the Government left the demand suspended, so that while claimants were compelled to purchase under the original order, and could not safely dispose of it while it remained unrevoked, they are entitled to recover what they paid for the ice that was lost, and what expense they were at in making the purchase and in keeping it until it was lost. So if they lost anything on the other ice not purchased at Lake Pepin, but purchased before they learned of the order of suspension, they should recover that.

Now, in regard to this Lake Pepin ice, the Court of Claims made a finding upon that. The eighth finding of facts is as follows:

> Of the 23,000 tons of ice purchased by said Parish between the 25th of March and the 2d of April, 1863, the quantity of 10,000 tons was purchased at Lake Pepin, in Minnesota, and in the month of April the stage of water in the Mississippi River was such that with sufficiency of steamboats and barges present there in the early part of that month that quantity might have been transported southward to St. Louis and the other places at which the said Parish was required by said contract to furnish said ice; but the said Parish did not have steamboats and barges at said lake in that month to transport the ice which he had purchased there, and after that month the water in said river became and continued so low that the said ice could not be so transported southward, and the same melted and was lost to said Parish.

Or, in other words, as to 10,000 tons of this ice they were not ready and prepared to deliver; they could not float it down from Lake Pepin to these points; they could not have tendered it to the Government; they could not have delivered it to the Government if the Government had demanded it at any time during this summer. Now, the chairman of the committee, as to this very patriotic gentleman who was furnishing this ice to the Government at the rate of $21 a ton and which cost him about $4 a ton, claims that the Supreme Court of the United States made a mistake in reversing, as he says, the tenth finding of facts. Well, the Supreme Court, it is very evident, has made no mistake. Why, the eighth finding of fact reverses the ninth finding of facts, so far as the 10,000 tons are concerned. But the court had the record all before them; the attorney for the claimants knew what the court had decided.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Only for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. How much did the 10,000 tons cost; how much per ton?

Mr. PAYNE. About $4 a ton. All the ice cost that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That would be about $40,000, then?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I will say to the gentleman, if the gentleman will not interrupt me, for I have so little time in which to make a statement, that I think I will cover all the points.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I just asked for information upon that point.

Mr. PAYNE. The Court of Claims found in the first place that he was entitled to $10,000, according to the statement the chairman made the other day. Afterwards it was reopened in the Court of Claims on additional evidence, and he recovered $64,000 damages on this 18,000 tons of ice; so that that man has received $228,914 and $64,000, or a total of $292,914; and by this modest little bill he comes in here and asks us to pay him $337,086 in addition to what we have already paid him, and that for ice that cost him, according to what he recovered before the Court of Claims, about $4 a ton, or about $120,000 for the whole 30,000 tons. He has made a profit, Mr. Speaker, of $160,000, and he does not come in here now as a pauper claiming the sympathy of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Did he ever receive the $10,000 to which you refer?

Mr. PAYNE. He received the $64,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I want to use my time. I desire to say that the other day in the Committee of the Whole House this matter was fully gone into. To-day I have upon my desk the opinion of the Supreme Court and the opinion of the Court of Claims. The other day I cited the fact that the Supreme Court does not go back of the findings of fact of the Court of Claims. That position is invulnerable, and there is no exception in a number of cases decided by the Supreme Court. They are guided by the findings of fact of the Court of Claims. Now the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] says that this ice cost only $4 a ton—the ice produced, for instance, at Lake Pepin in Minnesota and the ice on the St. Lawrence River in Canada—and that therefore, forsooth, he made the profits equal to the difference between $4 a ton and $18 per ton which he received for the ice he delivered on the Mississippi River at Memphis, at St. Louis, and at other points.

In other words, the gentleman commits the egregious blunder of not taking into consideration the very large expense of transporting this ice from Lake Pepin and from the St. Lawrence River down the Mississippi to the places of destination at these points on that river. I have a report here in my hand made some ten years ago upon this very claim, in which the estimated cost of the delivery of the ice, in addition to the $4 a ton which the gentleman says it cost where it was produced up in the northland, would range from $6 to $10 per ton. It required no small amount of money in those days to carry things so bulky as ice by water navigation the great distance of hundreds of miles down to the points of destination at Memphis, St. Louis, and the other two points.

Mr. MORRIS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. How about the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] a while ago, that there were 10,000 tons of this ice that this man could not have delivered at all? What is he entitled to at all on that 10,000 tons of ice? If he could not deliver the ice, why is he entitled to anything?

Mr. GRAFF. The finding of fact to which the gentleman refers simply states the opinion of the court that Mr. Parish did not have in his possession large enough steamboats to take this ice down the Mississippi River and deliver it at these points after the Surgeon-General of the United States had directed the assistant surgeon who made the original contract to suspend the delivery of the ice.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman from New York made the statement that this party had made a net profit of $160,000 on the transaction.

Mr. GRAFF. That is impossible.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman made the statement.

Mr. GRAFF. The cost of from $3 to $4 a ton for ice where it was produced, in a year when there was no ice produced in this country south of Chicago, added to the expense of delivery, which would range from $6 to $10 a ton, would bring the cost of the ice——

Mr. TALBERT. He said that was the profit made on the whole transaction.

Mr. GRAFF. That is impossible. This item of expense would bring the price of the ice up to something over $14 a ton, and the average he received at the different points ranged from $18 to $21 a ton.

Mr. MORRIS. Another question: Was the lack of transportation for this ice from Lake Pepin to where it was to be delivered due to the revocation of the contract by the Surgeon-General?

Mr. GRAFF. Why, exactly. That is the important point in the bill. The evidence before the court was the claimant in this case could have sold that ice for $50 a ton, but he held the ice, because he was liable under a written contract between him and the United States to deliver this ice at any time. This suspension that was made was very artfully made, for the purpose of compelling the claimant to hold this ice and ultimately allow it to melt and become valueless. It is not true, as stated by the gentleman from New York, that the United States receded in the Supreme Court from their position, claiming that the assistant surgeon had no legal right or power to make a binding contract.

That is the reason why the Court of Claims decided against the claimant. But when it went to the Supreme Court of the United States, page after page of their opinion, nine-tenths of the opinion, is devoted to setting aside that decision and overruling the decision of the Court of Claims, and deciding that the assistant surgeon-general had full power to make a binding contract against the Goverment with the claimant. In addition to this, in these court reports appears the notice given to all people, inviting them to come in and make a contract for this ice. This ice was to be used in the hospitals for the soldiers at these four different cities of the Mississippi, around which neighborhood clustered so much military activity and where the necessity for it became imminent.

Carry yourselves back to 1863, when this contract was made, when the whole world had the right to come forward and make a contract at the invitation of the Government, and not at the request of the claimant. What does this bill do? Attempt to decide how much shall be awarded to this claimant? It does not say that a cent shall necessarily be awarded to the claimant, but it is referred to the War Department of the United States, giving them full power to adjudicate this question and determine the facts of the case and award to the claimant in accordance with the One hundred and eleventh United States Reports, laying down the proper rule for damages. Does the gentleman mean that anywhere it is the law as a measure of damages that the man shall get the full contract price and not deduct the things which he was not compelled to do? The gentleman knows that the rule of law is that he shall only be allowed the contract price less the expenses of delivering, which he was not compelled to pay in this instance.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. Why did not you put that in the bill, instead of "deducting therefrom all payments which had been made?"

Mr. GRAFF. That is a part of the law of the land. These expenses are deducted, so that the proper measure of damages is laid down in the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. You failed to follow the law of contracts.

Mr. GRAFF. The One hundred and eleventh United States, the Rahan case, lays down another doctrine.

Mr. PAYNE. A doctrine in the case where the contract was annulled and not suspended.

Mr. GRAFF. Getting at the profit, they would not eliminate the expenses of the delivery. Of course the claimant was not compelled to deliver the ice if the Government did not call upon him to bring the ice.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, there has been a general criticism of these bills. Forty-six bills were brought in by this committee, and the gentleman had an opportunity to object successfully by reason of the absence of a quorum. The gentleman had questioned the work of this committee and sent reports throughout the country that we were about to loot the Treasury, and he could not find with all of his investigations any reason for preventing the passage of 36 of them. [Applause.] Thirty-six out of forty-six! Looting the Treasury, forsooth! Why, the 46 bills do not aggregate $300,000; and I have seen the gentleman sit silent and see appropriations of half a million dollars for pumpkin shows for favored portions of the United States [applause] under the pretense of fostering our commerce [renewed applause], but really which were for the benefit of restaurateurs, cigar dealers, and other gentlemen who feed a transient population. [Laughter and applause.] Ah, looting the Treasury——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHATTUC. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. GRAFF. Division.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I inquire what is the motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 88, noes 62.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 101, nays 98, present 9, not voting 144, as follows:

ELIZABETH MUHLEMAN ET AL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GROSVENOR). The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2116. An act for the relief of Elizabeth Muhleman, widow, and heirs at law of Samuel A. Muhleman, deceased.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill appropriating $5,000 to pay Elizabeth Muhleman, widow, and heirs at law of Samuel A. Muhleman, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury, and so on. This claim is based on the Ford's Theater disaster. It is claimed here by the claimant, Mrs. Muhleman, and those who have testified before the committee, that his death was caused by an injury received in the Ford's Theater disaster; that it caused aneurism, of which he died about four years thereafter.

Congress in 1893, immediately after the Ford's Theater disaster, appointed a Commission to examine and try all these cases. I was appointed on that Commission, and am the only member in Congress now that was on that Commission. The Commission was appointed, and for something over four years it was engaged in the trial of every case for all injuries to parties, or those who received their death, and finally it cost the Government about $330,000 in order to pay off these claims.

Now, it seems from the evidence in this case, and from the report as we get it from the Committee on Claims, that this man, Muhleman, claims that he was injured on that day; that he was examined by physicians immediately thereafter, again in 1893, and continued up to 1898; that he even went out into the State of Indiana to be examined for disease of the heart in 1895. Now, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, if it is true that this man received the injury which caused his death by reason of this Ford's Theater disaster, he ought to recover the amount asked for in this case. If it is not true, then he ought not to recover.

Mr. TALBERT. Did this man come before your Commission?

Mr. MADDOX. He never did. I was going on to say that this Commission, consisting of five from the House and five from the Senate, held open court for four years, not only during sessions of Congress, but during the interim, and everybody was invited to come before it, and we tried over 250 cases on their merits. Not only that, but it was required in this Department where this disaster occurred for every man who claimed an injury not only to register his name there, but also to register the injury, or the character of the injury, he received by reason of this accident, if you can call it an accident, which it was not.

Now, I want to say to the House that notwithstanding all these facts—that this Commission stood open here for four years—notwithstanding that every one of these men who had suffered injury was required to register his injuries at the Department, this man made no appearance before this Commission and made no claim; and he never registered at the Department as having been injured, but, on the contrary, served in that Department up till the time of his death—a period of five years; and now, four years after his death, this claim is presented to the House of Representatives.

The reason I have been anxious that I might be heard on this case by members now present is that if this claim be allowed then there is a precedent under which the heirs or legal representatives of every man who was present in that building at the time of that disaster and who has since died, or may hereafter die, can come before Congress and claim that his death was caused by that disaster. That is exactly what is going to happen.

If the Claims Committee, as I understand from their report—I do not know what they had before them except so far as it is disclosed in the report—had taken the trouble to investigate the other side of this question, they might have learned more about it. In order to ascertain the facts, I wrote to General Ainsworth, in control of the Record and Pension Office of the War Department, a letter inquiring about this matter, stating that as I had been a member of the commission I felt it my duty to call the attention of the House to the facts. Now, I wish to read the letter of General Ainsworth in regard to this claim:

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 2, 1903.

Hon. JOHN W. MADDOX, House of Representatives.

SIR: In response to your letter of the 31st ultimo, in which you inquire how long Samuel A. Muhleman continued in the discharge of his duties as a clerk in this office after the Ford's Theater disaster, also whether he was in the service at the date of his death, and why, if he was injured in the disaster, he did not present his claim to the commission that investigated such claims, I have the honor to advise you as follows:

The records of this office show that Mr. Samuel A. Muhleman was on duty at the Ford's Theater building at the time of the accident there on June 9, 1893, but owing to the fact that he was located on the first floor, near the wall which acted as a protection to him, he escaped injury from the falling floors. The records also show that immediately after the accident he registered with others on the list of survivors. Those who were injured were required to make a statement to that effect on the list, but Mr. Muhleman registered without remark.

Mr. Muhleman was employed continuously as a clerk in this office from the time of the accident, June 9, 1893, to February 14, 1838, the date of his death. There is nothing of record to show that during that period he ever claimed to have suffered any ill effect from the accident of June 9, 1893.

This office is unable to state why, if he believed himself to have been injured in the accident, he did not submit his claim to the Congressional committee that was appointed to investigate such claims.

Very respectfully,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Chief Record and Pension Office.

Now, gentlemen, this is a very remarkable case. If there is any virtue in it at all, is it not singular that this man, as appears in the report, was being examined immediately before this commission had been established by Congress, by these physicians upon whose evidence this report is based; that he should have visited the State of Indiana for the purpose of consulting an expert and yet that he did not present himself before the board of surgeons provided for by Congress—one from the Marine Corps, one from the Army, and one from the Navy; that he did not present himself before the commission that sat for years examining claims of this character; that he made no application before that Commission and no complaint of any injury having been received; and that no claim for any injury sustained by him is made until four years after his death? And now we are furnished with evidence purporting to show that he died by reason of an injury received in that Ford's Theater disaster.

Gentlemen, if we can reach back under these conditions or circumstances and connect alleged injuries of this person, what is to hinder the presentation of a similar claim in the case of every man who was present in that building at the time of this disaster and may hereafter die?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] has expired.

Mr. MADDOX. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. MADDOX. Who made the objection? Nobody rose and objected.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont (rising). Mr. Speaker, I object. It may seem ungracious for me to do so, but we have fixed this rule and we have many more of these cases remaining——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. GRAFF. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DOVENER].

Mr. DOVENER. Mr. Speaker, I have heard with some surprise the very singular reasons given by the only surviving member of the Commission appointed to investigate the Ford's Theater disaster who is now a member of this House. He says that if it is true that this man received the injuries he ought to be paid. To that I agree. The only question, then, for this House to decide is whether as a matter of personal judgment and because he was in the employ of the Government and did not care to make a claim shall defeat this bill, or whether his death, which brought loss and disaster upon his wife and children, was caused by the disaster at Ford's Theater.

There is no question that there is evidence before this body to-day which, if it had been brought before that Commission, would have entitled him to receive something in addition to his salary. It is true that he was not injured physically, but there is no question that the fall and certain injuries that he received at that time produced heart disease. He did not have heart disease before, and he died from heart disease produced by the shock and the disaster at Ford's Theater in 1893. I want to correct one thing which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] says, viz, that here, nearly five years after his death, there is a bill presented in Congress. I say that in that the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MADDOX. What is that?

Mr. DOVENER. The gentleman stated that nearly five years after his death a bill is presented for the first time.

Mr. MADDOX. I did not say that.

Mr. DOVENER. In that I say the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MADDOX. I did not say that.

Mr. DOVENER. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. MADDOX. Well, the gentleman is mistaken. I said four years afterwards.

Mr. DOVENER. Well, you said more than four years afterwards. This bill was presented and passed the Senate of the Fifty-sixth Congress, and the Senate bill came to this side, and among other bills was not considered in the House. It also passed the Senate in this Congress and is now being considered by this House. The Senate passed the bill, not on supposition, but on the evidence of gentlemen who were sworn before the Senate committee. First, Thomas Hynes made an affidavit that he was intimately acquainted and associated with this man previous to the 9th of June, 1893; that he knew Muhleman to be physically sound and healthy; that Muhleman was injured in the collapse at Ford's Theater, and that immediately after that he commenced to complain of his heart.

Fred K. Swett, a physician of ten years' standing, made affidavit that in July and August of 1893 he was consulted by Muhleman with regard to a difficulty in breathing and peculiar sensation in his head; that he found him suffering with this disease of the heart. James T. Hensey, Muhleman's physician, who had known him for eleven years, swore that before this disaster there was no disease of the heart from which he suffered, but that immediately after this he was called in to attend him and found he was suffering from certain bruises and injuries received on the outside, of slight character, but that his heart was troubled, and that from that time on the trouble continued to increase up to the time of his death, and was the cause of his death. Dr. Riggs, a practicing physician here in this city, made oath to the same facts; that he knew him before and afterwards; that the nervous shock and injuries received at the time of the disaster were the cause of his death. Dr. Johnstone also made the same affidavit. Dr. Kennard made the same affidavit, and Dr. E. A. Wearman, a specialist in Indianapolis, where Muhleman had gone to see if he could not get some relief, testified to the same facts and that it was the cause of his death.

Now, the only question here, according to the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX], is whether he contracted that trouble by reason of that disaster in Ford's Theater. If this trouble continued and was the cause of his death, the claimants ought to have the amount of $5,000, which was allowed in the case of others whose death was caused by the disaster. I think we ought to take into consideration also the fact that he was patriotic enough, when he was earning his living from the Government, not to make the claim. He thought all the time that he possibly might recover. Of course after he was dead he could not make the claim, and the loss falls upon his widow and children, who have been deprived of their support and his companionship, and all because of this disaster at Ford's Theater. Of these things there is not a contradiction, unless it be that implied in the fact that he did not make a claim. I ask the members of this House to be fair and listen to the evidence which is adduced in this case. I am content, then, to take the judgment of the House. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2216) entitled "A bill for the relief of Elizabeth Muhleman, widow, and the heirs at law of Samuel A. Muhleman, deceased," beg leave to submit the following report, and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment:

This is a bill that has already passed the Senate.

The facts on which the bill is founded are fully set forth in Senate Report No. 473, made by the Senate Committee on Claims during the present Congress, in which report your committee concur and adopt the same as its report.

The Senate report is as follows:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2216) for the relief of Elizabeth Muhleman, widow, and the heirs at law of Samuel A. Muhleman, deceased, having considered the same, beg to report as follows:

"A bill similar to this one was introduced at the last session and favorably reported from this committee. The bill was not reached on the Calendar. Your committee concur in the views expressed in the report made at the last session, adopt it as a part hereof, and recommend the passage of the bill.

"The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1582, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred Senate bill 1658, have had the same under consideration and make the following report:

"This claim arises out of what is known as the Ford's Theater disaster, and in which class of cases the sum of $5,000 was fixed as compensation in case of death by the commission and paid by the Government in a number of cases in which death resulted from injuries received in that disaster. Samuel A. Muhleman, deceased, the husband and father of the claimants, was a clerk in the employ of the Government and at his desk performing his clerical duties at the time of the disaster at Ford's Theater, and up to that time was a sound and healthy man physically. Other clerks occupying desks adjacent to that occupied at the time by Mr. Muhleman were killed, but Mr. Muhleman, through utmost physical exertion, saved himself, but came out of the débris frightened, bruised, sore, and with splinters in his flesh. The great physical exertion which he made at the time to save his life and the shock to his nervous system produced aneurism of the heart, which constantly progressed in severity from that time until February 14, 1898, when he died from aneurism incurred in the disaster mentioned, leaving surviving him a widow and four small children.

"Mr. Muhleman made no claim before the Commission for compensation for injuries received in the disaster for the reason that he was able to discharge his clerical duties, but he continuously suffered from extreme nervousness and from the increasing severity of the heart trouble thus produced from the time of the disaster until the time of his death, and was under the treatment of various physicians from July or August, 1893, up to the time of his death for the aneurism occasioned as stated. The evidence submitted in the claim clearly establishes the fact that prior to the Ford's Theater disaster Mr. Muhleman was a sound and healthy man physically; that aneurism of the heart was caused by the shock to his nervous system and the injuries which he received in the disaster, and that such aneurism continuously increased in severity from that time to the time of his death, and that he died from the effects of the injuries received in the disaster. The claim is a meritorious one, and your committee therefore report the bill back and recommend that it do pass.

"An abstract of the evidence in this claim is appended hereto as a part of this report."

Thomas Hynes makes affidavit that he was intimately acquainted with Samuel A. Muhleman and was employed in the same office with him for the past fifteen years; that previous to June 9, 1893, he knew Mr. Muhleman to be physically sound and healthy; that on that date Mr. Muhleman was involved in the collapse of Ford's old Theater building; that after that disaster he constantly complained of great nervousness and heart disease consequent upon the great exertion he was compelled to make to save himself from being crushed to death in the falling walls and débris of the wrecked building; that this nervous condition and heart disease constantly increased from the 9th day of June, 1893, until the day of his death, and that the cause of Mr. Muhleman's disease and his death is directly chargeable to the disaster at Ford's old theater building June 9, 1893.

Fred K. Swett, a physician of ten years' standing, makes affidavit that in July or August, 1893, Mr. Muhleman consulted him for a difficulty in breathing and a peculiar sensation in the head which he stated appeared very soon after the disaster at Ford's Theater in June of that year; that upon examination he found an irritable heart, and occasionally a slight murmur could be distinguished, rhythm and action were irregular, and dyspnœa was pronounced on slight exertion; that the head trouble he attributed to the cardiac lesion; that from October, 1893, to the spring of 1894 he saw Mr. Muhleman almost daily, and during all that period he suffered from heart trouble, and that on several occasions he was obliged to prescribe and administer remedies to give him temporary relief from his suffering, and that the heart lesion continued to the day of his death, and was the cause of his death.

James T. Hensey, M. D., makes affidavit that he was intimately acquainted with Mr. Muhleman from the year 1882, and was closely associated with him, both in business relations and as a medical man from that date; that previous to June 9, 1893, Mr. Muhleman was a sound and healthy man physically; that upon that date he was in the Ford's old theater building with Mr. Muhleman, and that it is personally known to him that Mr. Muhleman's peril was so imminent that it required the utmost physical exertion to save himself; that from that day until the day of his death he complained of extreme and ever-increasing nervousness and of heart trouble; that he was present two years afterwards at a physical examination made by Dr. R. B. Johnstone, which conclusively showed heart disease, rapidly progressive in character, and that the death of Mr. Muhleman is directly traceable to the injuries he received at the disaster at Ford's Theater building on June 9, 1893.

D. H. Riggs, a practicing physician, makes affidavit that he had known Mr. Muhleman for ten or twelve years and that he was a perfectly well man until after the shock he received in the disaster at the old Ford's Theater; that during the ensuing year after the disaster he made an examination of Mr. Muhleman and diagnosed his case as thoracic aneurism, and that such trouble undoubtedly caused his death.

R. B. Johnstone, M. D., makes affidavit that he made several examinations of Mr. S. A. Muhleman, some of which were conjointly with Dr. G. Howard Kennard; that at every examination he found every evidence of a dislocation of the heart, the apex beat being thrown over to the right side between the third and fourth ribs. This dislocation was due to a probable aneurism, which, from the history of the case, dates from the accident at the falling of the old Ford's Theater; that the extension of the dislocation of the heart was gradual and progressive, and was certainly resultant from the shock received at the time of said accident, and that it was the cause of death.

G. Howard Kennard, M. D., makes affidavit that since April, 1895, he made a number of examinations of the physical condition of Mr. Muhleman, the last being a few days before his death; that he found a misplaced heart, the apex beat being to the right side, about the fourth rib; that he also found evidence of an aneurism of gradual development, and which undoubtedly caused his death, and that this condition, which resulted in his death, was undoubtedly due to the excessive muscular and nervous strain suffered at the time of the collapse of the Record and Pension building, on Tenth street NW.

Dr. E. A. Wehrman, of Indianapolis, Ind., makes affidavit that in 1895 Mr. Muhleman wrote him that he was and had been feeling badly for a long time, and was coming out to have him make an examination of his condition; that in August, 1895, he, together with Dr. L. W. Jordan, at the request of Mr. Muhleman, made an examination at Indianapolis, and they found a well-developed aneurism of the aorta; that he knew Mr. Muhleman from boyhood up, and that he was a strong, healthy man of fine physique, and he believes that nothing was the matter with him before the Ford's Theater disaster that would predispose aneurism; that from his examination of him and the description given of the Ford's Theater disaster, the excitement and nervous shock which that disaster produced on Mr. Muhleman was the starting of his aneurism, which proved fatal February 14, 1898.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GRAFF) there were—ayes 20, noes 35.

Mr. DOVENER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted.

Mr. DOVENER. I raise the point of no quorum. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will announce that the yeas and nays are refused, and the gentleman from West Virginia makes the point of no quorum. When on a division less than a quorum votes and then tellers or the yeas and nays are refused, it is too late to make the point of no quorum.

Mr. DOVENER. I withdrew the demand for the yeas and nays and made the other point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair had counted and announced the result. Only six gentlemen rose and that was not enough. The Chair overrules the point of the gentleman from West Virginia. The noes have it and the bill is defeated. The Clerk will present the next bill.

L. A. NOYES.

The next business was the bill (S. 3546) for the relief of L. A. Noyes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to pay L. A. Noyes the sum of $1,819 for services rendered as acting assistant Treasury agent at the island of St. George, Alaska, from August 1, 1886, to May 30, 1887, inclusive.

The Treasury has a special agent and three subagents at the Pribilof Islands, looking after the Government seal interests there. During the winter they keep two men there and two come back to the States. On this occasion Mr. George R. Tingle was the special Treasury agent in charge, and his assistants were T. F. Ryan, A. P. Loud, and J. P. Manchester. Mr. Tingle and Mr. Ryan had spent the previous winter on the islands, and, in accordance with the custom of the Treasury Department, were entitled to go down and spend the winter in the States, leaving Mr. Loud and Mr. Manchester there. Captain Loud relieved Tingle at St. Paul Island, and Mr. Manchester was expected to relieve Mr. Ryan at St. George, but Manchester claims that he had a verbal understanding with the Secretary of the Treasury that he, too, was to come down; in other words, that he had an understanding with the Secretary that but one agent should be left there.

Mr. Manchester wanted to come, and Mr. Tingle very obligingly assumed to create another office and to appoint a man to fill the place, and so he appointed Dr. Noyes, who was employed at the time by the Alaska Fur Seal Company as its physician, leaving Dr. Noyes there in the dual capacity of serving the Fur Seal Company as its physician and also serving the United States as special Treasury agent at the island. I do not say this is any reflection upon Dr. Noyes, or that he did not do his full duty as well as a man could, acting in the dual capacity.

Now, Mr. Tingle claims that there was a precedent for this; that in 1870 Captain Bryant, Treasury agent in charge, appointed Mr. Falconer to fill a vacancy, and that the Secretary of the Treasury subsequently ratified the appointment and permitted Mr. Falconer to be paid without objection. Well, there was a vacancy at that time, an actual vacancy, and Captain Bryant did not have to create a new office and to create another Treasury agent, as was done in this case under this bill; but he assumed to appoint a man to fill a vacancy and the man stayed there, and when he had reported what he had done to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Treasury approved the appointment, and so paid the man his $6 per day. These agents are all paid the sum of $6 per day the year around, Sundays included, whether they are in the islands or whether they are in the States. The special agent and his three assistants are each paid the same amount.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] mistakenly stated the other day that Captain Manchester did not draw his pay for this time, but I am informed that he did draw his full pay and that there was no vacancy. So that it amounted to this, that Mr. Tingle legislated a vacancy, made an office, and filled the office by the appointment of Dr. Noyes, who was there as the doctor of the Fur Seal Company, and Noyes stayed there during the winter, and now he comes to the Treasury Department for pay for performing the duties of an office which has never been created by law. That is the simple bald statement of the case. If anybody owes him anything, it is Tingle or Manchester. It is the man who was relieved from duty and was allowed to come to his home and spend his winter and still receive his full pay, and I do not think Congress ought to recognize any such claim as this. That is all there is in the claim; that is the whole matter.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, if I should employ an agent to look after my affairs, and should employ an assistant for him, to do a certain line of work, and when the time came for that assistant to do that work, he should tell my agent that he had a verbal understanding with me that he did not need to do it, and my agent, acting in good faith and believing that he had the authority, should employ a man to do that work for me, and he did it properly, it being necessary work and I got the benefit of it, the courts of Vermont would find some way of making me pay for it.

I can not vouch for the courts of New York, and if I should undertake to defend upon the ground that I had unjustly and improperly paid that assistant for doing the work that he did not do, I would stand, I believe, in almost as unenviable a position as the gentleman from New York occupies when he asks the United States Government to refuse to pay this bill, which the United States Treasury says ought to be paid, for services that were necessary to the Government, for services that were meritoriously rendered by Mr. Noyes at the request of the agent of the United States Government, who claimed authority to appoint him and did appoint him, because, forsooth, the United States Government improperly and unjustly paid Mr. Manchester for doing the work that he never performed.

Now, that is the plain situation in this case. Mr. Noyes was not on St. George Island. He was a resident at the time, temporarily, of St. Paul Island. The United States Government, through its agent, when it was found that Mr. Manchester had an understanding that he might return home, requested Mr. Noyes to go from the place where he was—St. Paul Island—to St. George Island and remain there during the winter to look after the property of the United States Government and do the other work which was necessary to be done and for which Mr. Manchester was appointed. He went there and performed that work. The gentleman from New York has no right to claim that he was on St. George Island during these months in any other capacity than as an agent of the United States Government. The officials of the Treasury Department say in their report that they find reluctantly that the law prevents their paying this bill for services that were necessary, for services that were meritorious and properly rendered.

Now, under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I ask the members of this House to say to the United States Treasury Department that this honest bill for services rendered—necessary services rendered—by a man who was appointed by an agent of the Government, who took his oath of office, who supposed he had authority to render the services, and who supposed that after he had rendered the services the United States Government would pay him therefor, shall be paid.

Mr. PAYNE. Just one word, if the gentleman has concluded.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Then I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PAYNE. I only want to call attention to the unenviable position the gentleman from Vermont has taken. If I am employed by the Government, if I declare I want to go home and go home for six months and ask somebody else here to be my deputy and go through the form of making an appointment for a vacancy which did not exist, shall the Government, not only after they have paid me to do the work and sent me there to do it, be called upon to pay the other man, too?

Mr. GRAFF. Does the gentleman believe that has anything to do with this case? The fact that an official of the Government had gone off, when he should not have gone off, when another citizen is called upon to perform the duty, and did perform that duty, and the Treasury Department recommends that he should be paid for it, ought he not to be paid? That is so plain and bald a proposition that I think the gentleman might accept it.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not so plain and so bald that I can see it.

Mr. GRAFF. I think the gentleman ought to understand it.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I do say that Mr. Manchester ought to have stayed there and performed his work, but when he went to Mr. Tingle, who was in charge, and said he had an arrangement with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States by which he was entitled to return home and he was going to return home, and when Mr. Tingle by his instructions was commanded to leave some one in charge of that island, it became the duty of Mr. Tingle if he could find a man to find him and send him to St. Paul Island to discharge the duties which Mr. Manchester ran away from.

Mr. GRAFF. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. GRAFF. After the claimant entered upon his duty, did the Treasury Department recognize him in the performance of that duty?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes; just as far as it could.

Mr. GRAFF. I mean in relation to the performance of his duty.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes; and they say in their report that they find, reluctantly, owing to a technicality of the law, that they can not pay for these services, which they say "were both necessary and meritorious," and for which Mr. Noyes "is entitled to relief by Congress."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GROSVENOR). The question is on ordering the bill to a third reading.

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE) there were 39 ayes and 19 noes.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, of Vermont, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On February 2, 1903:

H. R. 10300. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the circuit and district courts for the district of South Dakota in certain cases, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 216. Joint resolution extending the provision granting to the State of Pennsylvania the use of the court-houses at Scranton and Williamsport, Pa.

On February 3, 1903:

H. R. 1592. An act for the relief of F. M. Vowells; and

H. R. 15711. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Clinch River, in the State of Tennessee, by the Knoxville, Lafayette and Jellico Railroad Company.

CHARLES R. HOOPER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 2637) for the relief of Charles R. Hooper.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that I objected to in the committee, and I think it is my duty to object to it now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact, of which the Chair was not advised, that this bill has been engrossed and read a third time, so that the real question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. If I can have the attention of the House for about three or five minutes at the outside, I can say all that I want to.

Charles R. Hooper, a mechanic employed in the navy-yard here at Washington, some 27 years old, while at work met with this accident. It is perhaps stated briefly by the helper, and I will read it from the report:

This is to certify that I am at present employed in the forge shop in the navy-yard at Washington, D. C., and have been for nine years. I have known Mr. Charles R. Hooper for the last nine years. Mr. Hooper was a blacksmith in the forge shop in the navy-yard at Washington, D. C. I was Mr. Hooper's helper for about two years, from 1893 to 1894. On the 1st day of August, 1894, about 1.36 p. m., Mr. Hooper was putting an iron band on a wooden body. I was striking for Mr. Hooper with a sledge hammer on the tool with which he was holding on the band, when my sledge hammer fell sideways, striking the tool and cutting a piece of steel out of it, which flew into Mr. Hooper's left eye. Mr. Hooper dropped everything, walked over to his anvil, and said his eye was gone. I saw the blood drop on the anvil.

Mr. Hooper is a sober and industrious young man, capable of filling any position in his line of business previous to the loss of his eye.

Respectfully,

JOHN H. SWAIN.

Now, I have no doubt that that statement is literally correct. I have no doubt that Mr. Hooper is a most deserving man. I am satisfied from the report that while he has not lost his sight, I am not sure but that he has lost the sight of this eye. I believe it was taken out and a sympathetic affection of the other eye renders it liable to make him blind. It has not done so up to this time. Now, that is the whole case. There is no statement in the report as to the circumstances of Mr. Hooper; whether he had an accident policy, how much property he has, how much property his friends have, whether he belongs to the Odd Fellows or any other organization from which he receives assistance. I do not know about that. All of us have sympathy with a man who loses his eye, and especially a worthy man, whether he be in the employ of the Government or is a taxpaying citizen dependent upon his own hustling for employment from other citizens.

Now, so far as the Government being legally liable here, it will not be claimed for a moment. If the employer had been a citizen instead of the Government, and this man was the employed, there can be no pretense that the employer would be liable. There can be no pretense that the Government is liable. Now, it is said here in this report that there was some showing before the committee to the effect that the striker was negligent. I do not know whether he was or not; I have read to you the account of the helper who made the strike. Nor does it matter whether he was negligent or not, the Government is not liable. It is a mere question of sympathy. We have the power to appropriate $5,000 for this man. We have the power, if lightning were to strike any worthy citizen, or unworthy citizen either, and kill him or blind him, we have the power to appropriate $5,000 or any other sum as a gift to that citizen or his legal representatives. The only limitation on our power is our sense of duty in the premises and the restraining influence of a wise and just public sentiment.

Now our citizens are all worthy, some of them employed by the Government at good wages, but the great mass of them employed otherwise than by the Government, and they are taxpayers. I think very likely that if many of the cases throughout the length and breadth of the United States, where people who are working for the Government meet with accidents could come here and sit in the House, with friends calling attention to it and to their condition, constantly in our sight, with tears of appeal, very likely we would have our sympathies aroused from time to time. That is human; but after all is said and done, there is in round numbers three or four hundred thousand people working for the Government. If we, every time that one is subjected to an accident, with or without the carelessness of a coemployee, would vote to them money from the Treasury, that would not be good policy, and if it is good policy then let us pass a general law. If a general law was proposed here there is not a man that would vote for it, not one.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, in his opinion, if this man had been working for a corporation under exactly similar circumstances, and under the facts in this case, the corporation would have been liable in a suit at law?

Mr. CANNON. In my judgment, there would not be the slightest liability. I am reenforced in that opinion by conversation with some of the best lawyers in the House, some of whom have been upon the bench, nisi prius and appellate, and they say that there can be no pretense of liability on the part of the Government.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has stated that the Government is a large employer of labor. Is it not a fact that in view of the great undertakings in which the Government is engaging—the building of canals, etc.—it will soon be a much larger employer of labor than it has been?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; and this labor for the Government is labor that is sought for as a matter of favor. It is no discredit, of course, for anyone to seek and receive this labor. Persons have a right to seek for it. But I submit that until the Government makes a departure that none of us are willing to indorse, until we adopt the principle that we will pay damages where accidents occur, or that we will give pensions to persons engaged in the civil service of the Government, we can not defend legislation of this kind.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow me a single suggestion? The preamble of this bill, in the second clause, recites that this injury occurred while Mr. Hooper was engaged in the forge shop; that he was by an accident struck in the left eye with a piece of steel, resulting in the entire loss of the eye. Now, there is no pretense of building up or basing this claim on any alleged responsibility of the Government. On the face of the case as stated in the bill, it is shown that this was an accident pure and simple—nothing but an accident.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. If I should consult the promptings of my heart, I would contribute to this man's relief, if his case should be brought to my attention, and if he should be willing to receive the contribution. I apprehend he would not do so. I have no doubt that he is an American citizen who deserves well. Whether he needs relief or not I do not know. But gentlemen here understand that our whole civilization is builded upon the self-reliance of the citizen, or, in case of personal distress or disaster, upon the assistance of friends, or the provision by life insurance companies, benevolent societies, etc., where the party suffering has not property upon which to rely; or locally, in cases of extreme poverty and suffering, upon relief from the local government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I hope that I shall have the attention of this House while I present this matter fairly. So far as concerns the statements that have been made by the gentleman from Illinois, he fairly states the case as it appears in the report of this committee. I am frank to say that the committee report is not as full and complete as it ought to be. The facts are that this man was a skilled mechanic in the employ of the Government in one of our navy-yards; that he was at the time of this accident in the act of using old machinery—machinery such as has long ago gone out of use—machinery no longer used by the Government of the United States or by corporations in doing this kind of work; but while his coemployee was striking and this claimant was holding the band in place with the old machinery, about which he and his fellow-workmen had time and again complained, but which had never been replaced by new machinery, which would have held the band in place without the man holding it at all, thus removing him from any danger whatever—while this man was performing this kind of duty in the employ of the Government, his coemployee gave a stroke with a hammer sidewise, and in doing so let the hammer fall on the machine that the claimant was holding, thereby knocking off a piece of steel, which flew into the eye of the claimant, from the effects of which he lost his eye.

Now, the testimony that appears in this report is the testimony of the claimant and his coemployee.

Mr. BOWIE. Will the gentleman allow me this question: On the facts just stated, if this were a suit at law against a private corporation, would not the claimant be regarded as guilty of contributory negligence in continuing in that employment after he had discovered the condition of the machinery to be such as now appears on the facts stated?

Mr. MILLER. I can only say in reply that possibly under a very rigid rule this might not be a case where the sufferer could recover, but I do not think that contributory negligence would ever be pleaded by any lawyer in any court in a case of this kind. I do not believe the time has come when a man in the employ of the Government of the United States, or any corporation, is to become a spy upon his coemployees and watch every blow that they strike and every act that they perform, so as to determine whether or not he shall have a case against the Government or the corporation in case of injury. I do not think the time has yet arrived when any lawyer in this country, pleading a case of this kind, would for a single moment argue that there was contributory negligence on the part of the claimant.

Now, as I have said, the testimony in this case is the testimony of these two persons; but, as appears in this report, these two employees of the Government appeared before this subcommittee and were carefully examined, and they both showed by their testimony that this accident occurred through the carelessness and negligence of the coemployee of the claimant, and without any fault or negligence whatever on the part of the man who is making this claim.

In addition to that we had the testimony of expert physicians in the case, who appeared before the committee and testified that in their judgment not only was the one eye entirely gone, but that on account of sympathetic action the claimant must lose the sight of the other eye.

I put this question before the committee on two grounds: First, that it is the duty of the Government of the United States in a case of this kind to care for the claimant, and also upon the broad ground of humanity, that it is the duty of the Government of the United States, rather than a private or public charitable institution or any lodge or Masonic fraternity to which the man may have belonged, to take care of him and his family under the present circumstances.

The testimony before the committee shows that this man has spent every dollar of the money which he had in this world trying to save the sight of the other eye, and to-day he and his wife and three children are penniless and are the subject of charity in the city of Washington. Shall the Government of the United States take care of these people or shall the Masonic fraternity be asked to take care of them for the rest of their lives? Here is a young man 27 years of age, in the bloom of young manhood, with every prospect of many years before him, years full of hope in which to earn a living for himself and his family, but the light of day has been shut out from him, or soon will be, forever. I ask the members of this House at this time to bring, as they come to this question with their votes, one ray of sunshine into the life of this poor man, so that he may feel that the Government of the United States is willing to do something for those who lose their sight in its service.

This House at a recent session passed a bill making an appropriation of $2,500 for a man who fell down an elevator shaft in the Treasury Department. The testimony in that case shows that he walked right into the doors of the elevator shaft, looking neither to the right nor to the left. He fell and broke his leg, and for the loss of that leg he was given by this House $2,500. I ask you not to strike at the blind. If you will strike, strike at men who have the sight to see. I ask you, while you are passing appropriations here for the payment of hundreds of thousands of dollars to corporations and men who have lost something, they claim, at the hands of the Government, or because of their own negligence, to give to this man what he asks in order that he may be able to get some of the happiness which ought to come to him in life. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE].

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, how much more time is remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the claimant, I introduced this bill. He lives now, I believe, in Washington, and some of his people live in the Sixth district of Maryland, which I have the honor to represent. I have heard several arguments made against this bill and against bills of a like nature in the House this morning, which strike me as having no real foundation or basis. I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is necessary that a claimant against the United States Government should be able to establish his claim under the law. I do not think that it is the necessary basis for appropriation by the Government in cases of this sort that the man should have a claim which he could have enforced at law, either against the Government or against a corporation, if the claim had been against a corporation instead of the Government.

There are hundreds of appropriations made, some of which have already been referred to, where there was no legal claim against the Government at all. Indeed, most of these claims are equitable in their character and in no sense legal. I remember about a year ago, or perhaps two years ago, there was contained in one of the appropriation bills, or in a separate bill, I am not clear which, an appropriation for the family of a man named Willett, who fell down the elevator shaft in the Post-Office Department. There was a suspicion at that time that that was not even an accident, but was a suicide. Yet one of the appropriation committees of this House recommended the appropriation and the appropriation passed the House. That family certainly had no legal claim against the United States Government. So was it with the case which was referred to by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER], which occurred in the Treasury Department, where another man fell down an elevator shaft and broke his leg.

Why, we invariably allow to the families of members of Congress the amount of salary remaining after the death of the Congressman during his term. There is no legal claim against the Government for that; there is not even a quantum meruit, because the Congressman is dead and not able to give the service to the Government for which the remaining amount of his salary would be paid. Yet it is given. I do not know whether it is given in charity or mercy or what not, but the families of Congressmen always get it. So it was, Mr. Speaker, in the case of General Ainsworth. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will doubtless remember that some money was appropriated—I think in the sundry civil bill—to compensate General Ainsworth for certain expenses to which he had been put in defending a suit arising out of the Ford Theater disaster. Was there any legal claim there? There was not even an equitable claim in the minds of many people, and yet that claim was favorably recommended and passed by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced that he was in doubt.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 38.

Accordingly the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HEIRS OF PETER JOHNSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6830) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the heirs of Peter Johnson certain money due him for carrying the mail, reported from the Committee of the Whole, with an amendment.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN]. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that he may wait until the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has stated his objections to the bill, if he has any.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that I would like to have this bill passed over for a few minutes, until I can get some reports that I have sent for.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be informally passed.

Mr. PAYNE. I should rather go on with it now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman objects.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I would like to have the gentleman from New York let it go over for a few minutes, and take up another just like it.

Mr. PAYNE. I would rather they would come up in this order. There are three of these claims.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Let me say to the gentleman from New York again that I wish he would let this bill go over for a few minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I said to the gentleman that there are three of these bills for carrying the mail, and I want them to come up in the order in which they are on the Calendar. I want this one to come up first.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The reason is, I have sent for the reports.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection to the gentleman sending for the reports.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. And they have not come in yet.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will ask that the next three cases go over for the present, I will not object to that.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I will not ask that.

Mr. PAYNE. Very well, then, we will go on.

Mr. Speaker, this is a bill for carrying the mail in the State of Texas between the 1st day of July, 1858, and June 30, 1862, as it reads in the bill. I think, however, that it does not include any services except from December 30, 1860, to May 31, 1861.

This matter of claims for carrying the mails came into the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses, and in the Forty-fifth Congress the whole thing broke down of its own weight. They were coming in here asking the United States to pay them for carrying the mail from the 1st day of January, 1861, to the 31st day of May, 1861. The Government made a proclamation in May that they would cease to carry out any contracts for carrying the mails in the seceding States on the 31st of May.

The Confederate Government also made a proclamation in May that they would assume all contracts on the 1st of June. Then they came into the Forty-fifth Congress and asked an appropriation for about $400,000 to pay for carrying the mails during those four months, and Congress voted that appropriation. Then they came in with a resolution to amend that appropriation in order to compel the Treasury Department to pay those claims, which the Treasury Department had not done, and, by the way, the first order was that the carrying of mail should be paid for up to the time that the States actually seceded, not to the 31st of May.

They sought to amend it by making it the 31st day of May, and then they tried to strike the provision that deducted all sums that had been paid by the Confederate government. Well, that thing was debated here for two days. No one knew much about it in the House, and finally Mr. Willets, of Michigan, discovered that the Confederate government had taken into its possession on the 1st day of June all the property of the United States relating to the carrying of the mails, mail bags, money in the post-offices, money due from postmasters, property of every description, save only the postage stamps. That appeared in that debate.

Mr. GRAFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. No; I can not yield. After that appeared, Mr. Reagan, who had introduced the resolution, saw the mistake that he had made, saw the lapse in his memory, because he had denied that the Government had made any such payment, and the whole thing broke down and the Committee of the Whole voted to strike out the enacting clause in the bill. They brought it back into the House, and after some begging the resolution was referred back to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and has been there ever since that day. There have been a few of these claims paid. They have come here to the Department—perhaps, a half a dozen of them—claims, I suppose, that have got through Congress at some time without people noticing what they were.

There are claims still unpaid; but it appears that the Confederate Government appropriated $800,000 to pay these claims. They went to work and paid them, and it was only about twenty years ago that this Government could find out anything on this subject; and then they bought the original book of the Confederate post-office department containing the payments that had been made upon these claims. They paid $2,500 to a private party for that book. What did they find? They found that the book had been mutilated by some interested parties, and a dozen sheets in some places torn out of the book, the last preceding leaf and the next leaf showing payments paid on account of United States transportation of mails, payment for this very service. How many there are who were paid on the sheets torn out no man can tell.

Now, it was said to us the other day that in some of these cases, and in this case, the gentleman had made the affidavit that he had not received payment, and it was stated that he was a reputable citizen, a man who would not make a statement that he had received payment if he had not. He took this contract in 1858. In 1860 he received a warrant from the Treasury, No. 6712, for $1,222.63. It appears that in 1883, on the 9th day of October, he made an affidavit that he had indorsed the warrant over to his friend, Thomas Taylor, who was the postmaster, and that Taylor had sent it to J. Putnam, a commission merchant in New Orleans, for collection, and that it was lost in the mails, and that they had received nothing on the warrant. He made an application for a new warrant to issue.

About this time other parties made claim for this warrant, claiming to own it, and a Government agent made a thorough investigation. They found that Johnson had assigned the warrant to one De Crow, and received from him full value for it; that De Crow sold it May 14, 1861, to this Mr. Thomas Taylor, and that Taylor paid it over to J. Valentine & Co. afterwards, who invested it for him in Confederate bonds. Johnson's affidavit stated that Taylor was dead, but the Government found that he was alive, and got his affidavit of all the facts in the case. Taylor's books were shown to the Government's agent, in which there was this entry against Valentine & Co.: "To cash, $1,282.75, P. O. warrant 122263."

The Government made a thorough investigation in New Orleans and found that no such a man as J. Putnam was ever there in the commission business. At the time Johnson made the claim for the lost warrant he made no claim whatever that anything was due him on this contract. Now, here is this witness who comes here pressing that this claim never was paid, and on his affidavit or statement, I do not know which, this committee say that the claimant has never been paid.

We have the statement of the Department that they have these mutilated records, and so far as the records show it does not show any payment of Johnson, and therefore the presumption is that he was not paid. But when he presented the claim for the lost warrant he said nothing about this few months of 1861 for carrying the mail. If he had a claim he would have presented it to the Post-Office Department. He had no such claim. We find that one of the States that seceded assumed to pay these contracts, and paid them to these mail carriers, and then the Confederacy came on and they assumed to pay them, and made an appropriation. Some of them came in a second time, and were paid. Some of these claims were presented to the Post-Office Department of the United States after they had been paid twice, on the claim that they had never been paid.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PAYNE. Not at this time. Now, Mr. Speaker, whether this is one of those cases where the book had been mutilated and the pages torn out where Johnson was paid, I do not undertake to say; but there is a strong presumption that he was paid, because of the appropriation of the United States Government, and the practice of the Confederate Government, because they did take and pay it out of the property of the United States Government. He did not make a claim for this payment when he made the demand for the warrant, and there is nothing to show that it has not been paid, unless it is the word of this man Johnson, who is impeached by the records of the Post-Office Department, by witness after witness of the Government, when he made a claim for this draft which he said he had lost and to get a duplicate draft. I say that this is a case that ought not to meet the approval of this House.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I tried to ask the gentleman from New York when that warrant was issued, and for what time.

Mr. PAYNE. It was issued for 1860, on this very contract.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. If that is true, the records of the Post-Office Department—the Auditor for the Post-Office Department—show that that has been paid, and he is not claiming that amount or that warrant.

Mr. PAYNE. Can it be possible that the gentleman did not understand anything I said?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. It may be possible that I did not understand the gentleman. I wanted to ask him if that was not for services rendered prior to December 31, 1860?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly; and he made a false affidavit. He impeached himself, and he is impeached by the records of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. This claim is for services after December 31, 1860.

Mr. PAYNE. Why, certainly.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. From December 31, 1860, to May 31, 1861. And he swore that it had not been paid, and the Confederate records show that it has not been paid. The records of the Post-Office Department at Washington show that it has not been paid. The gentleman from New York surely has not seen the last letter of the Postmaster-General, of date January 17, 1903. I want the gentleman to listen, because he has not seen this letter in which the Auditor for the Post-Office Department itemized every single claim that appears to be due now, and itemized every single claim paid by the Confederate Government, according to its records, to the amount of $457,541.15, and it shows that this claim has not been paid.

Mr. PAYNE. It shows on the record of the Post-Office Department that the Confederate Government paid over $568,000 prior to the first quarter in 1864, and it also shows that the records of the Confederate Government had been mutilated—whole pages having been removed, and in some places dozens of pages torn out right in the midst of this very matter.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. This letter from the Postmaster-General accounts for that difference. He says the Confederate Government appropriated $800,000, not only to pay the mail contractors, but postmasters and others in the postal service, and that $107,000 difference might have been paid to postmasters and other agents connected with the postal service.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman that the records show that so much was paid for mail transportation, and to distinguish it from the Confederate mail transportation they said United States mail transportation, $568,000.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. But the letter from the Postmaster-General shows that you are mistaken about that.

Mr. PAYNE. The records show it. Read us where he says that I am mistaken.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Has the gentleman from New York been to the office of the Treasury Department and examined the old Confederate records?

Mr. PAYNE. I have been to the office of the Auditor of the Post-Office Department and examined the old Confederate records, a method that I would commend, with becoming modesty, to my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. When did the gentleman go there?

Mr. PAYNE. This morning.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Why, Mr. Speaker, the report made by the Auditor upon his examination of his own records covers six months. He has been at that six months; that is, the Senate resolution directing the Postmaster-General to prepare an itemized statement of all these claims from the records, both United States and Confederate, was passed June 26, 1902, and this letter is dated January 17, 1903, and yet the gentleman says he has only been there this morning and made an examination and virtually says that the Auditor is mistaken. The gentleman from New York wants us to take his word for it from his hasty investigation.

Mr. PAYNE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He does not say anything of the kind or contradict what I say. He says that the records have been mutilated.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Yes, and the only difference he finds is this $107,000 to which you refer, and this is accounted for by the payment to the postmasters and other postal agents in the Southern States. Now, let me quote exactly what he says:

It is evident, therefore, that there was paid by the Confederate States Government $107,003.07 more than is shown by their records of individual payments, and hence it is believed that the statement submitted herewith is to that extent in excess of the amount actually due as shown by the records of this office, unless, as indicated in the appropriation act of the Confederate congress above referred to, the amount paid was made to persons under appointment in the postal service other than mail contractors, of which this office has no record.

So when the Union armies captured the Confederate records they did not capture those containing the appointment and payments of postmasters and others in the postal service, but did capture all that related to the mail contractors. From the Confederate records and the records of the Auditor's Office for the Post-Office Department it appears that the Confederate Government paid $457,541.15 and left unpaid $225,466.23, and the report of the Auditor shows that among the unpaid claimants is Mr. Johnson, this claimant.

Mr. PAYNE. On the contrary, the report of the auditor of the Confederate States for the first quarter of 1864 showed that they had already paid $568,000.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. For postal services, including postmasters, mail contractors, and others in the postal service. You have the record there; read it. I have read the record which you have before you, and it shows that the appropriations and payments were made for mail contractors and for others in the postal service—including postmasters and all others in the mail service. And in this report of the Confederate Government auditor we find that they spent $564,544.22, under the act of the Confederate congress, for postal contractors, postmasters, and others in the mail service. You have the report there; why not read it?

Mr. PAYNE. They got this after that record was made; they got it during Cleveland's Administration.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Has not the gentleman before him the RECORD for the Forty-fifth Congress, second session?

Mr. PAYNE. I have.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. If the gentleman will turn to page 1594 he will find that I am correct about it.

Mr. PAYNE. That record was made in March, 1878. This book, to which I refer, was bought when Mr. Carlisle was Secretary of the Treasury under the Cleveland Administration.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The gentleman said that the act of congress appropriated $800,000 to pay——

Mr. PAYNE. I said the Confederate congress.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Yes, I refer to the Confederate congress—that it appropriated $800,000 to pay only mail contractors. I say it appropriated that amount to pay mail contractors and every other man in the postal service.

Mr. PAYNE. They showed me the original in the office of the Auditor this morning.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Now, I want to ask this question of the gentleman from New York: Have you read and studied this letter of the Postmaster-General that he sent to the Senate January 17, 1903, by virtue of a Senate resolution of date June 26, 1902, asking the Postmaster-General to hunt up all these matters and find out the truth about it? Here is that resolution which brought forth the letter:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to send to the Senate the number of items and the total amount due to individuals for carrying the mails prior to May 1, 1861, in cases where the Confederate records on file in the Department fail to show payment by the Confederate Government.

Mr. PAYNE. I notice——

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I ask you whether you have read that letter?

Mr. PAYNE. I have not.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I know you have not; your speech would indicate it.

Mr. PAYNE. They showed me the original of it in the Post-Office Department this morning.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. How can the gentleman have any exact knowledge of this matter, which it must have taken months to prepare, when he has only looked into it for, perhaps, an hour this morning?

Mr. PAYNE. They did the best with the mutilated records they had. Some gentleman has very kindly—unwittingly, I suppose—opened up to these gentlemen the idea that the Government has not a defense in the records of the Confederacy against the payment of whatever amount may remain of these $220,000 worth of claims; and of course that would open a grand chance for the army of claimants.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I want to say to the gentleman that I have carefully examined the Confederate records in regard to this matter, and if the gentleman will make a careful examination he will find that according to the records of the Confederate Congress and the reports of the postmaster-general, and the records of the Confederate Government, and our Department records here—put everything in, giving you every advantage of everything you can claim—there are claimants to the amount of over $150,000 who have not been paid. Why, then, should the gentleman from New York, with his suspicious mind, maintain that this man is among the number who are frauds and liars, and not among the number of honest claimants who have never been paid, and who the records of the Department show have not been paid.

Mr. PAYNE. How can you show that, when the records are mutilated?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The gentleman talks about records being mutilated. A few moments ago he spoke, as I understood him, of a book having been bought from Mr. Carlisle having these records.

Mr. PAYNE. I said Mr. Carlisle bought this book. The gentleman can not misquote me in that way. But I have repeated time and again that whole pages—in one instance a dozen pages—have been taken out of the book, right along where these accounts should be.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The Auditor, whose duty it was under the resolution of the Senate to examine these accounts, has spent several months in doing so—from June 26 of last year to January 17 of this year—and he does not say that this book you speak of was mutilated, that pages were cut out. But he says that some of the records of the Confederate Government have been mutilated. We all admit that. But he does not say that they have been mutilated so much that on account of the mutilation this claim can not be investigated. I say to the House that this claim has never been paid, but is among the number which the Auditor sends to the Senate as being unpaid.

[Here the hammer fell.]

On motion of Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOHN L. YOUNG.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 7792) for the relief of John L. Young, with an amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I suppose many of the members of the House simply come in here and vote, without knowing what the character of the bill is; whether it is to pay a claim for carrying mail, or whether it is in the nature of a gratuity for some person; whether it is an honest and a just claim or not, and there is not much use of wasting the time of the House in speaking about the matter under consideration. Yet I deem it my duty to present the facts in this case, so far as I can get them. Here is a claim for carrying the mail in the State of South Carolina from the 1st day of January to the 31st day of May, 1861. It appears that South Carolina seceded on the 20th of December, 1860, and, as is well known, there was no Government of the United States exercised in that State during this entire period.

Another peculiar feature about this bill is that it is to pay John L. Young the amount. Still the bill and the report and all the records show that the contract was made with a railroad—the Spartanburg and Union Railway Company, I think, of which John L. Young was the president. The chairman of the committee, in looking around for evidence in this case, evidently wrote to the Postmaster-General to see if there was any assignment by this railroad company to John L. Young of the claim. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] evidently got on to the idea that before this bill passed the House there ought to be some kind of an assignment to Mr. Young. So he wrote to the Post-Office Department, and the Postmaster-General, under date of February 24, 1902, says:

> I find no evidence of the assignment of the claim for compensation for service by the railroad company to John L. Young, to which you refer.

Again, the Auditor of the Post-Office Department says:

> There is no evidence in this office that any service was performed from April 1 to May 31, 1861.

That includes two months of the time included in this bill. Mr. Speaker, it is useless to comment on these facts which appear in the records of the committee. The committee say in their report:

> The papers in the case satisfy your committee that said John L. Young, individually, is the owner of the claim and should be paid the same.

Well, the committee does not give us any light as to how Mr. Young came to be the owner of the claim. The papers do show that the chairman was looking after some paper to establish an assignment of the claim to Mr. Young, and he could not find it in the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; but do not take up much of my time.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Has the gentleman examined the evidence in this case?

Mr. PAYNE. I have examined simply the report in the case and what I could get in the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Here is the evidence in the case before the committee, and it has been in the committee room all the time. It includes affidavits, letters, and other material evidence.

Mr. PAYNE. Have you any assignment of this claim to Mr. Young in your hand?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. No; but I have two affidavits from Mr. Young that he was president of this railroad; that the Department discontinued the service on May 31, 1861; that on June 1, 1861, he resigned his position as president of the road, and made the road settle with him. They owed him some over $7,000, and he took this claim as part payment, and did no more postal work for the Confederate government.

Mr. PAYNE. He does not present any assignment of the claim?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Yes; he swears that they turned it over to him.

Mr. PAYNE. Did he bring any assignment of the claim?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. No assignment of the claim, but an affidavit.

Mr. PAYNE. That at some time it was assigned?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. And the further fact that this railroad in all these years has never put in any claim, has never claimed to own it. If the claim had been the property of the company, the company undoubtedly would have put it in.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman does not know whether this claim has ever been paid or not. I do not know whether it has been paid or not. The Confederate records that would have showed whether this claim was paid or not have been mutilated. They do not show whether it has been paid or not. They do not show its payment. What was contained in the missing leaves that some one took out before they turned the book over to the Government of the United States, of course we do not know. This claim comes in here forty years after it matured.

The gentleman says this claimant was loyal to the United States. Why in the name of common sense, then, did he not go to the Government of the United States in 1861 with this claim, if he had it, and present it forty-two years ago, instead of waiting until this time? The claim is not only old and dead, but it has an odor about it that seems bad to gentlemen who are seeking to do their duty here and to vote on claims according to their judgment whether they are right or wrong.

And now I want to state to the House that this is only the beginning of these claims. Some Senator introduced a resolution a short time since, calling upon the Postmaster-General to show all the claims for this class of postal service that did not appear by this mutilated record to have been paid, and the Postmaster-General of course had to return that. Before that the Department had not allowed anybody to see those records, especially if they were claimants. People were a little afraid to come in and make affidavit that they had not been paid, if they had been paid, for fear the record might turn up against them. The Senate resolution went over there and the Postmaster-General was obliged to disclose all that was in those records.

Now, at the next session of Congress we shall witness every one of these claimants rising up, or the heirs of claimants where the claimants themselves are dead, coming here to Congress, marshaled by claim agents who have undoubtedly ere this sent around their very alluring letters to the people to come in and make claims, promising that it shall not cost them anything, and that they will get half of what comes out of the Government of the United States, simply because this resolution went over from the Senate, and the Postmaster-General had to give up the lack of evidence he had as to some of these claims. He could not supply the missing pages torn out of this book. He can not supply the proof that these claims were paid, because the books have been mutilated by some person who was interested to do it before the Government could get hold of the book.

And so this is the opening of the door that we have, by one of the committees of Congress, and these claimants, after forty-three years, are invited to come in here and make their claims to the Congress of the United States. And no matter how fast they come, it will be impossible to keep half a quorum of the House to hear even a word of discussion of the facts as to these claims.

I have taken some pains to find out the facts as to these claims to which I have objected. I invite the members of the House to sit down in the quiet of their offices and read the facts as I have presented them about each one of these claims, and I think some gentlemen who have come in here since the argument will feel ashamed that they voted for the claim under these circumstances.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, we face this proposition: The gentleman who opposes this measure admits that he has not even read the evidence, and yet he violently opposes the measure under that admission.

Now, I want to say to that side of the House, this is certainly not a partisan bill and it certainly ought not to be a sectional measure. I am surprised at the gentleman saying that we ought to kill this measure because it is 43 years old.

Why, the gentleman knows that if the claim had come to Congress at any time prior to ten years ago it would have thrown that side of the Chamber into convulsions—the very name of rebel and Confederate veteran would have thrown you into sectional spasms. Such was the feeling that arose about any claim that came from anyone in any of the seceding States.

Mr. PAYNE. Was not this man a Union man, according to the statement of the gentleman?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I did not say so.

Mr. PAYNE. Did you not say a moment ago he was a Union man.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I did not say so a moment ago.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the gentleman to say so himself.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I did not say so. I said he was the president of the railroad that had the mail contract, and when the United States Post-Office Department discontinued the mail service, May 31, 1861, he at once resigned as president.

Mr. PAYNE. You were so understood by other gentlemen here.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Now the reason, gentlemen, and we all know it, why it has not been attempted to pass these bills through Congress was because of the sectional feeling engendered by the war. Why, my friends, in 1867 the sectional feeling and excitement ran so high that a bill passed through this House, through the Senate, and was approved by the President, forbidding any officer of the Government paying any claim or demand whatever, arising prior to the war, to anyone not known to be opposed to the Confederacy, however honest and just it might be. That statute is on the Federal statute books to-day.

For twenty years after 1867 the spirit that inspired that act was dominant in this House. The time is passed—ought to be passed—when such a spirit should seize and dominate a single mind or heart in this House. Mr. Young, the claimant, is an intelligent, cultured gentleman. He has lived the life of honorable citizenship for 82 years. He began life as civil engineer, and built for the most part with his own brain and brawn and money this railroad. He was president and manager of it until this service was discontinued by the United States Government, May 31, 1861. He immediately resigned, and had a settlement with this road the very next day and they turned this very claim over to him as a part payment for his services. Men of such character do not commit perjury to get a few dollars. I am informed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] that Mr. Young died about ten days ago.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield to me right there?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman try to explain to this House his honest opinion of how much United States mail was carried in South Carolina along about May, 1861?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I do not know how much; but certainly it was carried. Just about as much as it had been. I have a letter here from the Auditor of the Post-Office Department showing that mail service was not discontinued in South Carolina until May 31, 1861. By the way, I want to say that the Confederate postmaster-general compelled every single one of the mail carriers to settle with the United States Government to May 31, 1861, and these settlements were made. These very settlements appear to-day upon the Auditor's books.

Mr. LOUD. Why did they not settle this?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Simply because the war came on. The settlements were stopped. I hold in my hand the original copy of a letter written by Mr. Young to the Post-Office Department May 25, 1866, in which he demanded payment of this identical claim, and also the original letter from the Auditor in reply thereto. I want to read it to show you not only the feeling existing at the time, but that this claimant began at once after the war to insist upon payment of this claim, and to show also why it was not settled.

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
May 31, 1866.

SIR: Your letter of the 25th May has been received. I have, in reply, to say that you are doubtless aware that one of the evils which the rebels brought upon the people of the States declared to be in rebellion by the proclamation of the President was the suspension of the settlement and payment of all claims of contractors for services rendered prior to the war.

* * * * * * * *

Very respectfully,

I. N. ARNOLD, Auditor.

JOHN L. YOUNG, Esq.,
Office of the Spartanburg and Union Railroad Company,
Unionville, S. C.

That is the reason they were not paid then, and this gentleman has followed up his claim with letters to the Post-Office Department from 1866 and to the Congressmen who represented the district from 1866 to the present time. There are letters to the Congressmen in 1872, 1874, and 1877, Republican Congressmen, until now, insisting and showing at all times that this Government owed him for this mail service, for which he had never been paid a cent, and which was found to be due by the Post-Office Department May 31, 1861.

There on my desk is all the evidence, clear and voluminous. Here are affidavits, letters to and from the Post-Office Department, letters to and from members of Congress of his district, from 1866 till now, and other evidence material to the facts in the matter. Now, with this evidence, with the evidence of the Confederate records showing that this man was never paid a dollar, with the evidence of the Post-Office Department records showing that he has never been paid a dollar and that it is still due—with all this evidence, how can you declare that this man committed perjury? He has not been silent for these forty-three years. You have his letter to the Department, dating as far back as May 25, 1866, insisting upon payment of this very claim, and the letters of the Department showing why these matters were not then paid.

With this evidence before me as a member of the Claims Committee and as a member of this House, I would not, I could not, turn down this claim on the ground that the gentleman from New York had a suspicion that this was a fraudulent claim because some parties attempted twenty-five years ago to defraud the Government. I could not believe that Mr. Young deliberately committed perjury in order to get a few dollars out of the Government. I came to the conclusion—I was forced to the conclusion from the evidence that this was a just claim. I know, and you know, that the only reason that these Southern claims were not paid long ago was because of the feeling between the two sections, and because of the act of 1867 forbidding the payment of any of these claims.

Gentlemen of the House, as I have said, it is not a partisan question, it is not a sectional question, but it is simply one of justice. He has not slept upon his rights. He has pursued this claim for nearly forty years. All the records sustain his contention. He ought to be paid. The Government has had his services. The Government admits that it owes it in the letter from the Post-Office Department dated January 17, 1903, which my friend says he has not read. If any man will conquer his prejudices and read the evidence as we have read it and study it as we have studied it, he will be forced in spite of himself to the conclusion to which this committee has come unanimously, and which I hope and believe this House will come to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendments proposed by the committee.

The question was taken; and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE) there were—ayes 70, noes 42.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-three members present—no quorum. The officers will close the doors. The Clerk will call the roll. As many as are in favor of the passage of the bill, as their names are called, say "aye," and those opposed say "no." The Clerk will proceed with the call.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 108, nays 78, answered "present" 24, not voting 142; as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the proposed amendment to the title of this bill will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN F. LAWSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 7864) to pay John F. Lawson $237.96, balance due him for services as United States mail carrier.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this bill goes beyond anything that has ever been asked. It goes beyond any precedent that has ever been made, or any claim ever presented in any bill of this character. In the first place, away back in 1878, gentlemen on the other side of the House tried to get these bills paid up to the 31st day of May, 1861. Failing in that, they asked that they be paid up to the time that the States seceded. They failed in that. The bills of this character that we have already passed this afternoon provide for payment to the 31st of May. But here is a bill—

To pay to John F. Lawson, of Hickman County, Tenn., the sum of $237.96, being the balance owing to him for services rendered as United States mail carrier on route No. 10013, Tennessee, from January 1 to November 29, 1861, and said sum will be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. LIVINGSTON made a remark in an undertone.

Mr. PAYNE. Did not the State of Tennessee secede? The gentleman answers "yes." I thought it did; I had that impression; and that State was in the possession of the Confederate Government in 1861. So that there is no excuse whatever for extending the time of this payment.

Now, if this claim were simply extended so as to include the time that this man could actually have been required to carry the mail, it would not come to any such sum as is here named. I commend to the House the extreme care of my friend from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF], the chairman of this Committee on Claims—the care that he has for the Treasury of the United States—the care with which these bills are examined. Still, a bill comes in here to pay a claim up to November 29, 1861, upon a certain mail route. Why, sir, is there to be no end to this thing? Is there to be no limit? Is there to be no time fixed up to which these things are to be paid, if they must be paid under the leadership of the Committee on Claims?

And by the way, Mr. Speaker, I can not understand how that committee ever got jurisdiction of these three bills upon which we are acting to-day. I can not understand why these bills do not belong to the Committee on War Claims. I can not understand why the "ice bill" upon which we have been occupied to-day and last Friday came from the Committee on Claims and not from the Committee on War Claims. I am told by a member of the Committee on War Claims that the committee had the "ice bill" presented to them and that they turned it down. Yet it comes up here to-day from the Committee on Claims and the House passes it by a vote of 100 to 98.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, certainly.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The gentleman says that this proposed settlement is up to November 29.

Mr. PAYNE. I say the bill so reads.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. No; the bill reads "July 10."

Mr. PAYNE. November 29.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. No——

Mr. PAYNE (handing the bill to Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN). Well, there is the bill; read it.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The amendment is in accordance with the report.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no statement of an amendment in the report.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Let the gentleman read the report, and it will show what time this bill covers.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no statement of any amendment in the report or on the bill. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Read the report.

Mr. PAYNE. All there is in the report about these dates is in the letter from Mr. Castle, the Auditor for the Post-Office Department. Here is what he says:

SIR: In reply to your letter of December 13, 1901, relative to the claim of John L. Lawson for mail service on route No. 10013, Tennessee, from January 1 to November 29, 1861, you are informed that the compensation due Mr. Lawson from January 1 to July 10, 1861, the date to which the service was performed, in accordance with certificate on file, amounts to $316.30.

This would seem to indicate that Mr. Castle had computed the amount up to the 10th of July. There is a discrepancy between Mr. Castle's statement and the statement in the bill. But whichever may be the date intended, the House readily sees that it goes beyond May 31, when all these mail contracts were canceled by the proclamation of the Postmaster-General, which cancellation has always been recognized everywhere except in this Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The amount found due by the Auditor is the correct amount of the bill, which is up to July 10.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Speaker, the reply is made that it corresponds up to July 10. It is doubtful, from the statement of the Auditor, whether he is counting up to July 10 or November 29; but whatever date it is, it is the wrong date, and there is no excuse for paying this claim a moment beyond May 31, 1861. In fact, there is no excuse for paying it at all.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN rose.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I can not be interrupted all the time. The gentleman will have ten minutes and may correct it if he can. Mr. Lawson makes an affidavit that he carried the mail on the route from said date until November 28, 1861. He further states that he received about $74 on this first quarter of 1861 from the United States, and did not receive any more. So if we take it up to the time this State seceded from the Union, and that ought to be the proper date, and deduct the $74, there would remain the paltry sum of about $36 due on this contract, if he is able to make out his case, but we have a bill here to pay him $237. They pay him, confessedly, up to the 10th day of July, a month and ten days beyond the time that they themselves had tried to fix as the rule, and there is no excuse for that.

According to their own confession, they pay, as I believe, and as the bill states, down to the 29th day of November, 1861. Is the House to rush blindfolded into this business and pass this bill and make another precedent? Am I to be told by gentlemen on this side of the House, "Why, we are voting for this bill to pay the other side for voting for some of our bills; we want to pay our debts?" Is there a combination here, Mr. Speaker? Is that the reason that this money is to be voted out of the United States Treasury?

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the House but a moment or two. This is a bill to pay Mr. Lawson two hundred and thirty-seven dollars and some cents for balance due him under a mail contract. The services were rendered until July 10, 1861. The contract extended up to November 29, 1861. Now, the gentleman from New York raises the question of secession. The letter that I have here of the Auditor of the Treasury shows that Mr. Lawson continued to perform service for the United States up to the date for which he asks pay, and the Government accepted his service. He continued to perform the service, and the Government got the benefit of that service.

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that at the time the order was made to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] refers, of May 31, Tennessee was in the Union. It had voted down the first proposition of secession, and the next election was not held until some time in June, as I remember, and the State did not take action until later, so that practically up to the time that he is asking for pay Tennessee was in the Union, and this man continued to perform the service for the Government under his contract. I say that it is a small contention to come before this honorable body in behalf of the United States and say that the Government would receive his services and then not pay him the contract price.

I want to say more, that under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States none of the States were ever out of the Union. They were still States of the Union, and we have the bare, naked, bald question submitted to this Congress, if the Government made this contract and this man performed the service and the Government received the benefit of his service and continued to allow him to exercise the privilege of his contract and to perform the service, then how will the Government repudiate paying for the service which he performed? I say, Mr. Speaker, that we show by the records that the service was performed, that the Government got the benefit of it, that the amount the man claims is just, and that it is unpaid. There is no pretense in this case that it was ever paid by anyone, and I believe that the sense of justice of this House will vote to pay this old man what is justly and honorably due him under his contract.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Speaker, in that four minutes I wish to say that the rule in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fifth Congress, which was at one time voted upon as the rule, was the date of the passing of the ordinance of secession by the convention, and of course everybody knows that Tennessee went out of the Union the second time by the action of the legislature, some time in May, and there is no excuse whatever for continuing this claim down to November 29, or even down to the 10th of July.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. Tennessee voted down the first proposition of secession in February, and the next election was not held until, I think, the 8th of June, and later on the legislature ratified the vote under the second election, and it was practically the 1st of July before Tennessee went out of the Union.

Mr. PAYNE. Hold on, I can not give the gentleman all of my time. The gentleman seems to want to make a speech in my time. Mr. Speaker, it still holds good that the proclamation of the Postmaster-General was addressed to the State of Tennessee, as well as to other States that went out on the ordinance of secession passed by the legislature, and that the stoppage of the mail and the assuming of the mail by the Confederate Government commenced on the 1st day of June, and the assuming of these contracts commenced on the 1st day of June. There is not a particle of excuse for going beyond that on any theory of the case and voting to pay this man for a single penny after the 31st day of May.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Was he not required to settle with the Government up to the 1st of July?

Mr. PAYNE. No; he was not.

Mr. PADGETT. He was required to settle.

A MEMBER. Did he not settle with the Confederate Government?

Mr. PADGETT. How could he when Tennessee was in the Union?

The question being taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, on a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE) there were—ayes 73, noes 45.

Accordingly, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TALBERT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FRANCIS S. DAVIDSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following resolution:

Resolved, etc., That the President be requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1115) for the relief of Francis S. Davidson, late first lieutenant, Ninth United States Cavalry.

The resolution was agreed to.

GEORGE C. ELLISON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 3385) for the relief of George C. Ellison, reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard in opposition to this bill. It seems to me that these bills ought to be heard and passed upon on their merits. I am not for all claims nor against all claims. I think each should stand on its own merits. This bill appears to me to be unique. It is a proposition to pay $5,000 to a man who claims to have spent that amount in defending himself against the charge of murder.

The facts, as I gather them from the report—and I pretend to no knowledge of the case except what appears in the report—are these: A man named Ellison was the engineer in charge of the machinery in the basement of this building. A man named Small, who had been assistant engineer, and had been discharged for some reason, cherished an enmity against Ellison and had made threats against his life. On one occasion Small went down into the engine room, he at the time probably being under the influence of intoxicating liquor, and approached Ellison in a threatening manner. Ellison picked up a billet of wood, or an ax handle, and struck Small over the head. Small afterwards died from the injury, and Ellison was arrested and tried for murder.

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to this fact, that there is no pretense in this case from the report of the committee, and none will be made, that this man Small was attempting to destroy the machinery, that he was making any attack upon the House, or that he was there with dynamite or gunpowder to blow up the building. It was a personal assault, made by one man against the other. It is in identically the same situation as though the assault had been made when the man Ellison was going home, except for the fact that he was in the engine room down here in the basement of this building. In fact, it is identically the same as though a member of this House should be assaulted upon his way home to-night by some one who had taken umbrage at something that he had done here. It was a personal attack made upon Ellison by Small. In defending himself from it, putting the best construction upon the matter possible, he killed the man. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in that view of the case, and that is the most favorable view which can be taken, the United States Government can not possibly be liable for the costs of that trial.

But I want to call the attention of this House to another fact, and that is that this man Ellison had two trials before a jury of citizens here in the District of Columbia. The trials were about a year apart in point of time, so that any question of feeling arising out of the incident would have died out, and certainly one of those trials was a fair one. But in neither of those trials was Ellison able to gain an acquittal by a jury of his countrymen. And yet, on a case that was so questionable that two juries in the courts of the United States were unable to decide that this was even a case of self-defense, where the man was unable to show before two juries that the assault was not one for which he ought to have been punished, we have here a bill to pay $5,000 to this man for his own defense.

Let me say that the case was finally dismissed by the United States district attorney, and there never was an acquittal of this man in court. They bring here a letter of the judge before whom the case was tried, and the judge says he thinks it was a case of self-defense; as he remembers it, Ellison was lying on a sofa, and the man Small entered and made some demonstration, entered with threats, and Ellison jumped up and struck him with a piece of wood, from which blow he afterwards died.

Now, I submit that putting this case upon the most favorable hypothesis, putting it upon the hypothesis that the man was acting only in self-defense, there can be no question but what the assault was a personal one, for which the United States Government should in no case be liable or responsible. But putting it upon the facts as they appear in this record, we have the case of one man killing another under doubtful circumstances, under circumstances so questionable that twice a jury of his countrymen refused to acquit him, and yet the Government of the United States is asked to pay $5,000 for the cost of that trial—costs incurred by the man in his own defense. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this bill ought not to pass. The Government ought not to be compelled to pay a cent on any such showing of facts as this.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this bill was before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union last Friday. It was then briefly discussed, and the committee laid the bill aside with a favorable recommendation. In my opinion the bill is a just one, and I hope it will pass. Let me say this bill was introduced by my colleague, the late Amos J. Cummings. The claimant, Mr. George C. Ellison, was one of the most loyal and steadfast friends Amos J. Cummings ever had, and as a friend of Amos J. Cummings I am in favor of this bill. In my judgment any man in this House who will read the report or who is familiar with the facts in this case will favor this bill and vote for it. The record shows the equities are all with Mr. Ellison, and, as a matter of simple justice, he is entitled to this relief.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri has stated the facts in the case substantially, but partially, and only in a legal and technical way, like a lawyer for the defendant. It is true, however, that Mr. Ellison was for several years chief engineer of this Capitol. The life of every man in the Capitol during that time was in his hands. He was charged with the performance of the duty to look after the boilers and the engines in the engine room downstairs. He could not leave his post or run away without endangering human life.

He was faithful in the performance of that duty and stood heroically by his post when a man named Small, whom the Clerk of the House had discharged some time before on account of his drunken habits, and who had a grudge, without cause, against Ellison, and had threatened over and over again that the first opportunity he got he was going to kill Mr. Ellison. Small went down stairs one day, as the report shows, from the corridor of this Capitol, where he told several persons that he was going down stairs to kill Ellison. When he got into the engine room he threatened to kill Ellison, and Ellison retreated, and did not defend himself until he feared his life was in danger, and then, and not till then, did he act on the defensive by picking up a piece of wood and striking this man Small in self-defense. After this Small went away.

Nobody thought he was seriously injured. He was around the streets of Washington for several days afterwards, apparently intoxicated. Finally he was taken to a hospital and died. After his death in the hospital an examination was made and it was discovered that Small's skull was fractured. Mr. Ellison was accused and put on trial. He had two trials in the city of Washington and was discharged. A statement is made by Mr. Ellison of the cost of these trials, and it figures up to over $9,000. Mr. Ellison was finally acquitted, but the expenses of these trials made him a poor man. All the money he had saved by a life of industry and economy for years and years was spent in his defense. I desire to read as part of my remarks the items of his expenses on each trial:

It made Ellison a bankrupt, and now, after years of suffering for doing his duty, in his declining years he only asks the Government to pay him $5,000, which I think is very reasonable and fair, just and right. If you will read the report you will find letters from some of the most distinguished men in this country saying Mr. Ellison acted in self-defense while in the performance of his office and only did his duty; and you will find a letter from Judge Andrew Wylie, the justice who presided at the trials—I think it is Exhibit No. 1—in which he says:

WASHINGTON, March 22, 1880.

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor, dated January 22 last, from the Ebbitt House, was never seen by me till this morning. It came to my house, doubtless, while I was at court and was mislaid.

I do not suppose that you desire that I should make a statement at length of the evidence or even of the facts which were proven on the trial of The United States v. Ellison. I shall therefore merely give at present the conclusion to which my mind was brought by the evidence in that case.

The defendant was tried for the murder of a man named Small. (I believe this was the name of the deceased.) Ellison's character had always been excellent, and at the time of the homicide he filled a place of confidence and trust at the Capitol. Small had previously been an employee there in a place subordinate to that of Ellison, and had been removed. He was a person of violent temper and intemperate habits. He thought Ellison had been instrumental in having him removed, and had made threats against the latter, which had been told to Ellison. One morning he entered Ellison's room at the Capitol and made demonstrations which, taken in connection with the threats, were well calculated to create alarm in Ellison for his personal safety.

Ellison sprang up from the sofa where he was lying, seized a billet of wood, and struck Small on the head. Small fell, but soon got up again and went away, no one supposing that the injury was fatal. He was drinking pretty hard for several days afterwards, but went about the city. It turned out that the skull had been fractured, and at the expiration, I think, of about nine days he died.

I thought, from all the evidence, that Mr. Ellison had good reasons for apprehending great bodily danger from the deceased, and that it was a case of justifiable homicide, and of that opinion was the jury.

It is always nearly a misfortune to be obliged to take human life even in self-defense, but in this instance I think Mr. Ellison should be held to have been without reproach.

Truly, yours,

ANDREW WYLIE.

Hon. S. L. MAYHAM.

The facts in the case conclusively prove that Mr. Ellison only did his duty and acted in self-defense, and no jury in the world would decide otherwise.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Where did Mr. Ellison live? Where was his home?

Mr. SULZER. I do not know. I am only discussing this case from the facts in the report, and from those facts I believe the bill is a just and meritorious measure.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Do you know whether the claim that you now present has the approval of the gentleman from New York—the watchdog of the Treasury in these cases?

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman is present. He can answer.

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman that it has not the approval of "the gentleman from New York."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Did you not vote for it in the Committee of the Whole the other evening?

Mr. PAYNE. I did not.

Mr. SULZER. I am informed that the gentleman did. But, however, I care nothing about that. I do not care whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is in favor of the bill now or against it. I do know, nevertheless, that if Amos J. Cummings were here to present this claim to this House and fight for it, that the gentleman from New York would think twice before he would oppose it. [Laughter and applause.]

I say, and it can not be successfully denied, that it is the duty of the House of Representatives to protect and preserve the safety and efficiency of its officers and employees so long as they are acting in the line of their duties, or whenever they may be required, in great emergencies, to do acts not held or found to be unlawful, for their personal and official protection, while in the discharge of their duties, or to enable them to properly discharge such duties, and that such duty to protect and defend its officials and employees extends to the duty of reimbursing such officials and employees for any and all expenses properly and necessarily incurred in and about such duties, or lawful, or unusual and not unlawful, acts demanded by the exigencies of the situation for the proper and efficient discharge of their duties.

Mr. Speaker, just a few words more. It may be said, and I think the gentleman from Missouri did refer to it incidentally, that there is no precedent for this bill. Why, sir, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is full of similar precedents. In the report accompanying this bill is cited precedent after precedent where this House has paid the expenses of one of its officers or employees where he acted in the performance of his duty and incurred expense.

I will only cite now to gentlemen of this House the well-known case of Hallet Kilbourn, in which the Government reimbursed him for all the legal and incidental expenses he was put to in defending himself from charges brought against him while in the performance of his duty as an officer of this House; and so if the House votes down this bill it will establish another kind of a precedent that some time or other may come back to worry and annoy us, because as a matter of right and law the House ought to stand by every officer or employee who honestly, fearlessly, and faithfully does his duty; and if ever there was an officer of this House who honestly, fearlessly, and faithfully did his duty, in the face of grave danger, it was this brave and loyal man Ellison; and I hope there will be no man in this House so unjust, so unsympathetic, and so uncharitable as to refuse to reimburse him by giving him this small sum of $5,000. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to say in reply to the gentleman's statement as to what the late lamented Mr. Cummings would have said in regard to this bill. I suppose the members of this House will gauge their action on this claim by their own conscience, and not by that of any other gentleman, however distinguished.

I want to say this, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] has not contradicted any one of the points I made in opposition to this measure. He cites the Hallet Kilbourn case, which, as my friend informs me—I was not familiar with it—was a case where the House ordered the arrest of a man, and in executing that order the man afterwards brought suit against the officer of the House and the House defended its own proceeding. This man was not defending the House, he was not defending the property of the House, and he was not in performance of his duty. This House had never given him any commission to kill anybody to protect himself. That is a right that came to him, not by law of this Congress, nor by the authority of the House. It was inherent in him; it is the same right that every man has, and if you pay him for defending his life, you ought to pay every other Government employee, no matter who or where he is, whenever he gets into trouble and presents a case of self-defense sufficient to hang a jury on. That is all there is in this case, and I submit it ought not to pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question was taken; and on a division (called for by Mr. SULZER) there were—ayes 10, noes 81.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SULZER. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That comes too late. The gentleman asked unanimous consent to withdraw the bill, which was objected to. That was a parliamentary act of the House. Other business has intervened, and it is too late now to make the point of no quorum.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16990, the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROBB].

Mr. ROBB. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I had the pleasure of hearing the very interesting discussion by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] of the political tendency and the relative prospects of the two great parties, viewed in the light of the recent elections. The adherents of the respective parties represented by these gentlemen were bidden to be of good cheer and invited to confidently look forward to that great (and according to the gentleman from Missouri not unequal) contest in 1904. They were discussing the vote, and the situation as viewed from the vote, presuming, we are to infer, that in the next campaign there is to be no substantial change in the issues.

If the issues are to remain practically the same, as I believe they will, and if the prospects for Democratic success are encouraging, as I believe they are, it may be pertinent and important to inquire the cause of our defeat in recent campaigns. What was the cause? That is, what was it but for which Democratic success would have resulted?

Some may say it was popular disapproval of the Democratic position on the money question in 1896; some may say it was popular approval of the Republican policy of imperialism in 1900; but it was not because of either. I will tell you what it was that defeated Mr. Bryan in 1896 and again in 1900. During the campaign of 1896 Mr. Bryan said:

> I am glad that if I am elected there is not a trust or syndicate that can come to me and say, "We put you there; now pay us back." I am opposed to the trusts. As an Executive I shall use what power I have to drive every trust out of existence.

And again, in his letter of acceptance in 1900, he said:

> Our platform, after suggesting certain specific remedies, pledges the party to an unceasing warfare against private monopoly in nation, State, and city. I heartily approve of this promise. If elected, it shall be my earnest and constant endeavor to fulfill the promise in letter and spirit.
> I shall select an Attorney-General who will, without fear or favor, enforce existing laws; I shall recommend such additional legislation as may be necessary to dissolve every private monopoly which does business outside of the State of its origin.

The trusts knew that these were the words of one who would, if elected, carry them into execution. They knew that Democratic success meant trust extermination and Republican success meant trust perpetuation, and the trust, by throwing to the support of the Republican candidates all the power and influence which aggregated wealth and concentrated capital could command, succeeded in electing them. With the trusts and trust influence eliminated Republican success would have been impossible, and, although aided by all the power which the trust could command, had not the promises and pledges of the Republican party on the trust question—promises and pledges yet unredeemed and unfulfilled—deceived and misled thousands of voters, Democratic success would have been assured.

The cause of our defeat was the power of the trusts in American politics, as exemplified in their ability to manipulate and manage a great party in their own interests and so as to deceive a large body of our people. The trust question therefore rises in importance not alone as our industrial affairs are affected by the trusts, but as they affect our social and political system. It is the most important question which has or will come before this Congress. It is the most important before the American people to-day. It resolves itself into this: Is this to be a government of the trusts, by the trusts, and for the trusts?

The record of the Republican party on the trust question has been one of broken pledges and violated promises. Under it, and as the direct and responsible result of Republican legislation, the trusts received their first inspiration. Under it they were given life and have flourished. Under it they have been fostered and encouraged and have increased in strength and grown in numbers until they embrace nearly every important branch of our industries. They have been permitted to fasten themselves upon our industrial system until those exercising the powers of the Government stand hesitating and halting in pretended fear that the so-called business interest may be disturbed by an honest effort to enforce existing laws or enact new legislation. Still none are so bold as to stand upon the floor of this House and openly undertake to justify their existence; none who will say there is any necessity for their being or any benefits to be derived by the public or the country from their continuation, and few there are who doubt their great and dangerous power, threatening alike to the welfare of our people and to the institutions of our Government.

The modern trust is a new form of monopoly which sprung into existence in our country and, like all monopolies, is designed to destroy competition, control the product, and regulate and fix the price of the article. Mr. William H. Cook, in his book on trusts, in speaking of the combination known as a trust, said:

> It is neither a corporation or a well-defined common-law trust; it avoids the checks and safeguards which a wise public policy has thrown around corporate acts; its articles of agreement are secret, and jealously guarded even from the inventor himself; no charter or statements need be filed for public inspection; no reports need be made or published; it may carry on any business it desires; the principles of ultra vires acts do not check it; no limit is placed by statute on the capital stock; no law prevents an increase or decrease of the trust certificates; no qualifications are prescribed for its trustees; no tax is laid on the franchises or capital stock; it may move from State to State; it may, and does, evade taxation, and defies the power of the courts; it wields vast sums of money, secretly, instantaneously, and effectually to accomplish its nefarious ends; and it does all this, not for the advancement of the country and the nation, but for the purposes of extortion and for the annihilation of independent firms. (Cook on Trusts, p. 53.)

And further on he says:

> It is a monopoly, and the most cruel, the most harsh, and the most detestable of all monopolies. It presses hardest on those who are least able to pay its exactions. It is a grievous burden which is borne, not by the rich and powerful, but by the poor and weak. It is a monopoly in the necessaries of life, in those things which render possible the daily existence and comfort of the farmer, the mechanic, and the laboring man. * * * It is a monstrous wrong. It is a wrong which never has been and (we trust) never will be endured by an English-speaking people. (Id., p. 55.)

The legislation against the trusts has nearly all been enacted within the last ten or fifteen years, for the obvious reason that prior to that time the trusts had not made their appearance as a disturbing factor in our industrial affairs. Monopoly in whatever form it appeared, always odious, always injurious, always illegal and criminal, was dealt with by the courts under the principles of the common law. In 1889 thirteen States passed antitrust provisions. Kansas, Maine, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas exacted statutes upon the subject, and the new States of Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming adopted constitutional provisions.

Following them came five more States and one Territory with statutory enactments in 1890, viz, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Dakota, and the Territory of Oklahoma. Then in 1891 Alabama, Illinois, Minnesota, and the Territory of New Mexico, and in 1893 New York, Wisconsin, California, and Nebraska enacted antitrust laws, and many other States have since followed with similar enactments. So that we have in a large majority of the States of the Union antitrust provisions, either statutory or constitutional, designed for the prevention of the trusts. What does this all indicate but that the people in every section of our country were becoming disturbed and alarmed at the growth of monopoly and were determined to supplement the provisions of the common law with whatever power they possessed to prevent its taking a firm hold on American soil?

Prior to the advent of the trusts the courts had not been slow in putting the seal of their condemnation on all forms of private monopoly. Always and everywhere they saw in them the selfish and grasping hand of greed, with no other or better purpose than to filch from the public that to which in justice they were not entitled. I desire as a part of my remarks to insert excerpts from a few of these decisions, to show that the courts have uniformly held that combinations, the design and effect of which are to give the persons combining a monopoly in the manufacture, sale, or control of a commodity, are unlawful and against public policy and that all contracts and agreements for such purpose were illegal and void at common law. In the case of Leslie v. Lorillard (110 N. Y., 533) the court said:

Corporations are great engines for the promotion of the public convenience and for the development of public wealth, and so long as they are conducted for the purposes for which organized they are a public benefit; but if allowed to engage, without supervision, in subjects of enterprise foreign to their charters or if permitted unrestrainedly to control and monopolize the avenues to that industry in which they are engaged they become a public menace, against which public policy and statutes design protection.

In this case it is declared that they become a public menace by being permitted to control and monopolize unrestrainedly an industry.

In the case of Morris Run Coal Company v. Barclay Coal Company (68 Penn. St., 173), five companies engaged in operating coal mines combined together for the purpose of governing the supply and price of coal. Agnew, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

The effects produced on the public interests lead to the consideration of another feature of great weight in determining the illegality of the contract, to wit, the combination resorted to by these five companies. Singly each might have suspended deliveries and sales of coal to suit its own interests, and might have raised the price, even though this might have been detrimental to the public interest.

There is a certain freedom which must be allowed to everyone in the management of his own affairs When competition is left free, individual error or folly will generally find a correction in the conduct of others. But here is a combination of all the companies operating in the Blossburg and Barclay mining regions, and controlling their entire production. They have combined together to govern the supply and the price of coal in all the markets from the Hudson to the Mississippi rivers, and from Pennsylvania to the lakes. This combination has a power in its confederated form which no individual action can confer.

The public interest must succumb to it, for it has left no competition free to correct its baleful influence. When the supply of coal is suspended the demand for it becomes importunate, and prices must rise. Or if the supply goes forward, the price fixed by the confederates must accompany it. The domestic hearth, the furnaces of the ironmaster, and the fires of the manufacturer all feel the restraint, while many dependent hands are paralyzed and hungry mouths stinted. The influence of a lack of supply or the rise in the price of an article of such prime necessity can not be measured. It permeates the entire mass of community and leaves few of its members untouched by its withering blight. Such a combination is more than a contract—it is an offense.

In Salt Company v. Guthrie (35 Ohio, 672), McIlvaine, C. J., says:

Public policy unquestionably favors competition in trade, to the end that its commodities may be afforded to the consumer as cheaply as possible, and is opposed to monopolies, which tend to advance market prices to the injury of the general public. We think the contract before us should not be enforced. By it all the salt manufacturers (with one or two exceptions) in a large salt-producing territory, and whose aggregate annual product is about 140,000 barrels, have combined for the expressed purpose of regulating the "price and grade of salt." A board of directors is chosen. All salt made or owned by the members, as soon as packed into barrels, is placed under the control of the directors. "The manner and time of receiving and distributing salt shall be under the control of the directory."

"Each member of the association binds himself to sell salt only at retail, and then only to actual consumers, at the place of manufacture and at such prices as may be fixed by the directors from time to time." The directors make monthy reports of sales and pay over the proceeds to the members in proportion to the amount of salt received from each. The clear tendency of such an agreement is to establish a monopoly and to destroy competition in trade, and for that reason, on grounds of public policy, courts will not aid in its enforcement. It is no answer to say that competition in the salt trade was not in fact destroyed, or that the price of the commodity was not unreasonably advanced. Courts will not stop to inquire as to the degree of injury inflicted upon the public; it is enough to know that the inevitable tendency of such contracts is injurious to the public.

In Alger v. Thacher (19 Pick., 51), Morton, J., enumerates among others the grounds that invalidate contracts in restraint of trade, the following:

Fourth. They prevent competition and enhance prices.

Fifth. They expose the public to all the evils of monopoly. And this is especially applicable to wealthy companies and large corporations, who have the means, unless restrained by law, to exclude rivalry, monopolize business, and engross the market. Against evils like these, wise laws protect individuals and the public by declaring all such contracts void.

Many other cases might be cited, not only showing the almost universal condemnation of monopoly by the courts, as being in restraint of trade and subversive of the liberty of the citizen, but the above are sufficient. I desire, however, to refer to a celebrated case and a leading decision decided by the supreme court of Michigan in the case of David M. Richardson v. C. H. Buhl and Russell A. Alger, 77 Mich., 632. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] denied that Russell A. Alger ever owned a cent of stock in the Diamond Match Company, I want to state that in that case he was not only a party but testified as a witness that the object of the combination was to control prices.

The court found that the combination formed by the Diamond Match Company was unlawful, and declared that a corporation organized for the purpose of controlling the manufacture and sale of matches, and crushing out all competition and opposition was a menace to the public. Chief Justice Sherwood, in that case, said:

Monopoly in trade or in any kind of business in this country is odious to our form of government. It is sometimes permitted to aid the Government in carrying on a great public enterprise or public work, under Government control, in the interest of the public. Its tendency is, however, destructive of free institutions and repugnant to the instincts of a free people and contrary to the whole scope and spirit of the Federal Constitution, and is not allowed to exist under express provisions in several of our State constitutions.

Indeed, it is doubtful if free government can long exist in a country where such enormous amounts of money are allowed to be accumulated in the vaults of corporations, to be used at discretion in controlling the property and business of the country against the interests of the public and that of the people for the personal gain and aggrandizement of a few individuals. It is always destructive of individual rights and of that free competition that is the life of business, and it invites and perpetuates one of the great evils which it was the object of the framers of our form of government to eradicate and prevent.

It is alike destructive to both individual enterprise and individual property, whether conferred upon corporations or individuals, and, therefore, public policy is, and ought to be, as well as public sentiment, against it. All combinations among persons or corporations for the purpose of raising or controlling the prices of merchandise, or of any of the necessaries of life, are monopolies and intolerable, and ought to receive the condemnation of all courts.

From Michigan to Florida and from Maine to California protest against the monopolizing of our great industries had not only been made, but had found expression in the legislative will and in judicial decision. It was under these circumstances that what is known as the Sherman antitrust law was born. From the close of the civil war, for a quarter of a century and more as the result of Republican policies and Republican legislation, the wealth of the country has been steadily diverted from the many and concentrated in the hands of the few.

A moneyed aristocracy had arisen and rapidly grown in power until it assumed to control not only our great industries but the Government itself. All the evils of a strong, centralized, and consolidated power were not only threatened but had actually been felt. The States were powerless to afford full and complete relief. Their authority could not be extended beyond State boundaries. The discrimination by, and merging the interests of, great railroads, and the consolidation of great manufacturing and producing establishments operating in numerous States and over a wide territory were beyond their control. In response to a public demand as well as a public necessity Congress in 1887 enacted the interstate commerce law for the regulation of railroads doing an interstate business and of preventing discriminations and unreasonable charges.

Three years later, on July 2, 1900, the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies" was approved and became a law. This is what is called the Sherman antitrust law, although it is said the distinguished gentleman whose name it bears had very little to do with the enactment of the law and that he failed and refused to vote for the bill on its final passage. I desire here to insert the law as a part of my remarks.

An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

SEC. 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. Every contract, combination in form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce in any Territory of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or in restraint of trade or commerce between any such Territory and another, or between any such Territory or Territories and any State or States or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations, is hereby declared illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. The several circuit courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act; and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. Such proceedings may be by way of petition setting forth the case and praying that such violation shall be enjoined or otherwise prohibited. When the parties complained of shall have been duly notified of such petition, the court shall proceed, as soon as may be, to the hearing and determination of the case; and pending such petition and before final decree, the court may at any time make such temporary restraining order or prohibition as shall be deemed just in the premises.

SEC. 5. Whenever it shall appear to the court before which any proceeding under section 4 of this act may be pending, that the ends of justice require that other parties should be brought before the court, the court may cause them to be summoned, whether they reside in the district in which the court is held or not; and subpœnas to that end may be served in any district by the marshal thereof.

SEC. 6. Any property owned under any contract or by any combination, or pursuant to any conspiracy (and being the subject thereof) mentioned in section 1 of this act, and being in the course of transportation from one State to another, or to a foreign country, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law.

SEC. 7. Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act, may sue therefor in any circuit court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

SEC. 8. That the word "person," or "persons," wherever used in this act shall be deemed to include corporations and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of either the United States, or the laws of any of the Territories, the laws of any State, or the laws of any foreign country.

It is a notorious and much to be regretted fact that this measure has not afforded the relief to which the people were entitled and which they had a right to expect. It has remained, except in a few instances, practically a dead letter upon the statute books. If it is claimed that it is weak and inefficient, it can at least be said of it that it has stood for more than twelve years unamended and as a silent monument of the conditions which brought it forth and a living testimonial of the indisposition of those having the power to do so to amend, improve upon, or enforce its provisions. If the law is a good one why has it not been enforced? If it is defective why has it not been amended so as to make it effective?

More trusts, exercising greater powers for evil, have been formed during the last six years than in all the history of the country before. The conditions demanding relief have grown in urgency and in importance and still no relief has been or is likely to be granted. The responsibility must rest with the Republican party, which has been in complete and absolute control of all departments of the Government. Even now after all the talk of antitrust legislation by this Congress the trusts do not seem to be alarmed. The following appeared in the Washington (D. C.) Post of January 12, 1903:

TRUSTS NOT ALARMED.

There was a rapidly advancing stock market last week while Congress was struggling, with more apparent sincerity than has been the case in recent years, to frame legislation for the control of the trusts by the Federal Government. The fact that the markets did not suffer sharp declines on the publication of the Administration bill for controlling the trusts and upon the repeated reports that President Roosevelt will call an extra session of Congress if antitrust legislation is not enacted during the life of the present Congress, indicates one of two things: That Wall street believes the whole antitrust programme to be a bluff, or else that the leaders of finance believe that the proposed legislation, if enacted into law, will not seriously interfere with their business plans.

This security on the part of the trusts can not be justified upon any idea of the lack of power in Congress to deal effectively with them. The President, the Attorney-General, and the Supreme Court have all decided that Congress has plenary power. The old contention in favor of a constitutional amendment, which party exigencies brought forth, having served its purpose, has been laid aside. It is simply a question, in the matter of legislation, as it is in the enforcement of existing law, of the exercise of the power.

I believe, by a proper exercise of the power given under the present law and vigorous and determined prosecutions, many of the trusts against which public attention and public censure is now directed, would have been destroyed, and that many more which have been formed would never have had any existence. At the same time I do not wish to be understood as contending that the law is a perfect and complete one. I think it is far from it, and that it ought to be extended, enlarged, and improved upon by amendment or supplemental provisions, so as to facilitate and render more certain prosecutions under it.

But of the few cases which have been prosecuted and which have reached the Supreme Court of the United States good results in at least some of them have followed. The act of July 2, 1900, has not been before the Supreme Court in but few cases, namely: United States v. E. C. Knight Company, 156 U. S., 1; United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U. S., 290; United States v. Joint Traffic Association, 171 U. S., 505; United States v. Hopkins, 171 U. S., 578; Anderson v. United States, 171 U. S., 604, and Addyston Pipe and Steel Company v. United States, 175 U. S., 211.

In the Trans-Missouri Freight Association and Joint Traffic Association cases, two of the most gigantic combinations ever known, designed to fix and regulate freight rates, were destroyed. In the Addyston Pipe and Steel Company case, six establishments engaged in making cast-iron pipe for gas, water, and sewer purposes, and controlling the market in that commodity in 36 States, entered into a combination to control prices by suppressing competition among themselves, the court sustained the suit of the United States to enjoin them as being in violation of the antitrust law. The effect of the decision in the Knight case, otherwise known as the Sugar Trust case, is considered by some to leave nothing in the antitrust act for the Government to stand upon. Indeed, this seems to be the opinion of the Attorney-General, for in his Pittsburg speech, after reviewing the case, he says:

These cases seem to define the scope of the antitrust law and show how little there is now left for the statute to operate upon.

The court held in the Sugar Trust case that a combination to control manufacture or production which did not necessarily and directly affect interstate commerce was not within the provisions of the act. It was held upon the evidence in that case that the combination only related to manufacture and not to commerce. The Government seems to have rested its case upon the idea that the control of the manufacture necessarily involved the control of its disposition and operated in restraint of interstate commerce, without offering any evidence relating to the disposition of the manufactured article. It is possible that that case failed on account of the failure to submit the evidence which might have been obtained. In fact, the court said in that case:

There was nothing in the proofs to indicate any intention to put a restraint upon trade or commerce, and the fact, as we have seen, that trade or commerce might be indirectly affected was not enough to entitle complainants to a decree.

And the Supreme Court, in the Addyston Pipe decision, in commenting on this case, said:

The direct purpose of the combination in the Knight case was the control of the manufacture of sugar. There was no combination or agreement, in terms, regarding the future disposition of the manufactured article; nothing looking to a transaction in the nature of interstate commerce. The probable intention on the part of the manufacturer of the sugar to thereafter dispose of it by sending it to some market in another State was held to be immaterial and not to alter the character of the combination.

The various cases which had been decided in this court relating to the subject of interstate commerce, and to the difference between that and the manufacture of commodities, and also the police power of the States as affected by the commerce clause of the Constitution, were adverted to, and the case was decided upon the principle that a combination simply to control manufacture was not a violation of the act of Congress, because such a contract or combination did not directly control or affect interstate commerce, but that contracts for the sale and transportation to other States of specific articles were proper subjects for regulation, because they did form part of such commerce.

An examination of the decisions will disclose that each case is dependent upon its own peculiar facts and circumstances, and, as was stated in the opinion in the Addyston Pipe case:

All the facts and circumstances are, however, to be considered in order to determine the fundamental question—whether the necessary effect of the combination is to restrain interstate commerce.

It was said in that case:

The commodity may not have commenced its journey and so may still be completely within the jurisdiction of the State for purposes of State taxation, and yet at that same time the commodity may have been sold for delivery in another State. Any combination among dealers in that kind of commodity which in its direct and immediate effect forecloses all competition and enhances the purchase price for which such commodity would otherwise be delivered at its destination in another State would, in our opinion, be one in restraint of trade or commerce among the States, even though the article to be transported and delivered in another State were still taxable at its place of manufacture.

And again:

Where the contract is for the sale of the article and for its delivery in another State, the transaction is one of interstate commerce, although the vendor may have also agreed to manufacture it in order to fulfill his contract of sale. In such case a combination of this character would be properly called a combination in restraint of interstate commerce, and not one relating only to manufacture.

The most modern trust has taken the form of a single corporation. A consolidation of several corporations into one, in the effort to evade and escape the provisions of antitrust laws. Some have thought that under this new device it was impossible to reach them—that being a single corporation it could not conspire and combine with itself to restrain trade, and that it would escape the prohibitions and penalties of all laws against monopoly, both State and Federal. But the courts so far have held otherwise. The Illinois supreme court in the case of Ford v. Milk Shippers' Association (155 Ill., 166), in which it was insisted that being a corporation it could not violate the statute of that State, replied:

The corporation, as an entity, may not be able to create a trust or combination with itself, but its individual shareholders may in controlling it, together with it, create such trust or combination that will constitute it with them alike guilty.

And the St. Louis (Mo.) court of appeals in the case of National Lead Company v. S. E. Grote Paint Company, which came under the antitrust law of that State in a unanimous opinion, written by Judge Bond, said:

It must follow that if the stockholders and governing officers of the plaintiff corporation combined with each other to violate any of the provisions of the section under review through the instrumentality of their corporate entity, then the corporation composed by them was a party to such illegal combination within both the letter and the spirit of the above section of the act of 1891. Or, correctly stated, that a combination which is illegal under the antitrust law can not be operated under the cloak of a corporation, and by its constituent members or governing bodies.

There are a number of other cases to the same effect.

There are those who, recognizing the evils of trusts, say they can not and will not be suppressed; that they are here to stay; that the most we can do is to endeavor to regulate and restrain them in the commission of wrong within endurable degrees and tolerable bounds. What does this mean, if true, but that a condition has arisen in our country which many of us feared might arise, when the trusts, the combined power of consolidated and centralized wealth, was stronger than the Government itself. I am not ready to believe that this condition has yet arisen, but I look forward to the future with apprehension if all the powers of the Federal and State governments are not speedily exercised.

Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States gives to Congress the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes" and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing" power. The Supreme Court of the United States, in speaking of this power in the Addyston Pipe case, said:

The power to regulate interstate commerce is, as stated by Chief Justice Marshall, full and complete in Congress, and there is no limitation in the grant of the power which excludes private contracts of the nature in question from the jurisdiction of that body. Nor is any such limitation contained in that other clause of the Constitution which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

And further on in the same case they said:

If Congress has not the power to legislate upon the subject of contracts of the kind mentioned, because the constitutional provision as to the liberty of the citizen limits to that extent its power to regulate interstate commerce, then it would seem to follow that the several States have that power, although such contracts relate to interstate commerce and more or less regulate it. If neither Congress nor the State legislatures have such power, then we are brought to the somewhat extraordinary position that there is no authority, State or national, which can legislate upon the subject of or prohibit such contracts. This can not be the case.

The power which we have is a full, complete, and perfect power. We can, if we will, so legislate as to drive every trust out of existence. Every means should be adopted to accomplish that end.

The great question with which we have to deal should be approached with a firm determination to do something and to accomplish something. We should not approach it in a spirit of timidity.

Mr. Chairman, the report accompanying the bill which has been reported by the majority party in this House is more than half apologetic to the wrongdoers against whom we are supposed to be legislating.

The bill is an able effort to do no harm and little good. It comes to us as the combined wisdom of the Administration and those specially selected for its preparation, of how to legislate and do nothing. The great bill which has been in prospect so long and about which so much has been said has been laid before this House. "The mountain has been in labor and brought forth a mouse."

While I intend to vote for the bill, I hope to see it amended so as to make it more far-reaching and effective. The amendments proposed by the minority members of the committee should be adopted. The publicity provisions should be made to apply to all corporations—those heretofore as well as those hereafter organized—and not simply those hereafter organized, as provided in the bill.

If publicity is offered as a panacea, why let the great trusts of to-day escape it? A more detailed inquiry into the affairs of the corporation should be made and penalties should be provided for failure to make the return, in addition to authorizing suit to be brought to restrain them from doing an interstate business. Section 6 should be amended so as to apply to any other association of individuals monopolizing the manufacture and sale of any commodity. As the section now stands it only includes corporations.

It should be further amended so as to deny to any corporation or association or person violating any of the provisions of this act or the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, not only "the facilities or instrumentalities of interstate commerce," but in explicit and express terms the facilities of the mails, the telegraph, and the telephone. In addition to these and other amendments suggested by the minority members of the committee, I would require from every corporation or association of persons doing an interstate business, as a part of its return, a statement showing whether it was or was not a member of any combination or party to any contract or agreement such as is prohibited by the act of July 2, 1890.

It is beyond my comprehension how anyone who is honestly and sincerely in favor of any legislation against the trusts can persuade himself to vote against the following amendment, proposed by the minority:

SEC. —. The President is hereby authorized, and it shall be his duty, whenever it shall be shown to his satisfaction that by reason, wholly or materially, of the existence of the tariff or customs duty upon any article, such article, or articles of its class and kind are monopolized or controlled by any person, organization, or combination to the detriment of the public, by proclamation to remove or suspend such duty, in whole or in part, until the next assembling of Congress, or until the abuse prompting him to such action shall have ceased.

If this amendment should be adopted, what a splendid opportunity it would afford our President to put in force his oft-repeated expression that "words should be backed up by deeds."

Senator John Sherman, in speaking on the antitrust bill on March 21, 1890, said:

If the combination is aided by our tariff laws, they should be promptly changed, and if necessary equal competition with all the world should be invited in the monopolized article.

And again, in the same speech, he said:

The people pay high taxes on the foreign article to induce competition at home in the hope that the price may be reduced by competition and with the benefit of diversifying our industries and increasing the common wealth.

But the competition at home, which it was hoped might reduce prices, has been stifled by the trusts, and the prices which our own people are required to pay are higher than the people of foreign countries pay for the same commodities manufactured, exported, and sold to them by our home-grown and home-supported trusts.

Great as are our diversified industries, the opportunities for independent enterprises are swiftly and surely being restricted and withdrawn by these giants of monoply, and the people are being reduced to a condition of dependence and industrial servitude. Let the international barriers to competition from abroad be withdrawn, where competition has been artificially restricted or destroyed at home, and we will have done much toward solving the trust problem.

Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to corporations. I am not opposed to the legitimate combination of capital for the purpose of carrying on great enterprises; but it is quite a different proposition when it comes to allowing the few, by means of the devices of shrewd and designing men, to lay unjustly their heavy hand on the property of the many. And that is what the trust does.

Judge Black, of Pennsylvania, in graphic language described the trusts as inventions to increase the power of the monopolist and "through which his felonious fingers are made long enough to reach into the pockets of posterity, so that he lays his lien on property yet uncreated, anticipates the labor of coming ages, coins the industry of future generations into cash, and snatches the inheritance from children whose fathers are unborn." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I would have the trusts go, and not be ceremoneous about their leave-taking. I would have American politics and American industries lifted above and beyond the control of monopoly. I would have the country return to that great principle in all just governments—that great doctrine of Democracy, of "Equal rights to all men and special privileges to none." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. BOUTELL, Speaker pro tempore, having taken the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had instructed him to report that it had further considered House bill 16990, the Post-Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. LOUD (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. MASON. I desire to ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD remarks which I have prepared in support of the bill (S. 6710) to provide for the temporary operation of coal mines by receivers, which has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill was introduced by my colleague [Mr. CULLOM], and I desire to submit the remarks in the nature of a brief in support of it for the benefit of the Judiciary Committee. I have spent considerable time in preparing the statement, and, in order to save the time of the Senate, I want to have it printed by order of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may print in the RECORD certain remarks.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, there is no Senator whom I would more willingly accommodate by agreeing to a request of this character than the Senator from Illinois, but I think Senators will all bear me witness that we have never yet given leave to print in the Senate, and I doubt very much whether we ought to do it. Would it not suit the purpose of the Senator to have his statement printed as a document?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois now asks that the speech which he proposed to make may be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday passed the bill (H. R. 15449) to increase the efficiency of the Army. It is the bill known as the staff bill. I desire the reconsideration so that a small amendment may be added which is deemed necessary and which has been agreed upon. It will only take a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate to the bill named by him were ordered to be engrossed and the bill read the third time, and passed. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. On motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], the Senate struck out the words "or the Secretary of War," on page 3, in section 4, line 4. I now move to insert, after the word "President," the words "or the Secretary of War under the direction of the President;" so that it will read:

That the chief of staff under the direction of the President, or the Secretary of War under the direction of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, in section 4, line 4, after the word "President," it is proposed to insert "or the Secretary of War under the direction of the President."

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ISSUANCE OF A DUPLICATE CHECK.

Bartlett, disbursing clerk, in favor of Fannie T. Sayles, executrix, and others. The bill was drawn by the Department, and it is now discovered that a mistake was made in stating the number of the check. The Department has called our attention to it, and I now desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday passed the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. TELLER. I am informed that the bill has gone to the House of Representatives, and therefore I move that the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

EMILY LAWRENCE REED.

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emily Lawrence Reed, widow of Walter Reed, late major and surgeon, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $35 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] to the fact that a pension for Emily Lawrence Reed, widow of Walter Reed, late major and surgeon, United States Army, is now being considered.

There has been great pressure, I will say, Mr. President, in behalf of this pension, to make it a large pension. Dr. Reed was a renowned scientist, and he is reputed to have discovered the cause of yellow fever, claiming that its transmission is by way of mosquitoes, and it is claimed in his behalf that his discovery is going to eliminate yellow fever from the causes of death in this and other countries.

Without expressing an opinion on that point, Mr. President, I will say that the committee were bound by their rules to report this bill at $35 per month, but I will venture the suggestion that if the Senate in its wisdom feels like overruling the committee on this matter I shall raise no factious opposition to any action the Senate may take.

Mr. MARTIN. Some days ago, Mr. President, the Senate, at my request, ordered printed as a Senate document a memorandum giving a brief account of the discoveries of Dr. Reed. That document has not yet been printed. I had hoped to have it on the desk of every Senator before this bill was considered; but as I am familiar with it, I will briefly present the views entertained by me and which were fully sustained in that document.

Dr. Reed undoubtedly discovered the method of the propagation of yellow fever. It is not a mere suggestion that he may have discovered it, but he demonstrated to the satisfaction of the scientific world everywhere, not only in the United States, but in every part of the world, that he discovered the method of propagation of yellow fever; and with that discovery in mind he devised methods which have actually eradicated yellow fever from the city of Habana for the first time in more than one hundred and eighty years.

The Secretary of War, in an address delivered by him in this city since the death of Dr. Reed, which took place on the 23d day of November last, stated that in his opinion this discovery by Dr. Reed saved to the United States more lives than were lost in the Spanish war, and to commerce more money than the entire cost of the Spanish war.

I myself, Mr. President, when present at some memorial exercises held by the Medical Association of the city of Washington in memory of Dr. Reed, heard General Wood, who was in command in Cuba at the time these discoveries were made, go further than the Secretary of War went, and say that for each year the discovery saved more lives than were lost in the Spanish war and for each year saved more money than the entire cost of the Spanish war.

This discovery is one of the greatest benefits conferred on mankind since the discovery of Dr. Jenner. It has been recognized by most of the leading medical and scientific societies of the world. In the Senate document which was recently ordered printed there are even resolutions adopted by the medical profession in Egypt. Such resolutions have come in, as I have stated, from every section of the civilized world recognizing the great benefit conferred upon mankind by the discovery of Dr. Reed.

I think, Mr. President, it would be exceedingly unfortunate if such services as have been rendered should not receive some recognition more than a pension of $35 a month from the Congress of the United States, and without detaining the Senate to go to any further extent in this matter I move that the bill be amended by inserting $125 per month in lieu of the $35 reported from the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Amend the committee amendment by striking out, before the word "dollars," the word "thirty-five" where it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "one hundred and twenty-five."

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the honorable Senator from Virginia that there be inserted in the bill words something like these, "in special recognition of her husband in discovering," etc.; so that it will not stand like an ordinary pension. It is no particular honor to him except as a precedent for every other case.

Mr. LODGE. That is right.

Mr. MARTIN. Adopting the suggestion of the senior Senator from Massachusetts, I will also ask that the bill be amended by adding the words "in special recognition of services rendered in Cuba in connection with the discovery of the method of the propagation of yellow fever."

Mr. HOAR. I would put it in this way, "in special recognition of the eminent service to mankind of said Walter Reed in the discovery of the cause and cure of yellow fever."

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is right.

Mr. MARTIN. I am glad to withdraw my last amendment and have the one suggested by the senior Senator from Massachusetts submitted in place of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

Mr. HOAR. It is to add at the end of the bill——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia desires to retain his first amendment increasing the sum?

Mr. MARTIN. That is to remain. I did not withdraw it.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that it had been adopted. The amendment I suggested is to come in at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia to the amendment of the committee has not been adopted.

Mr. HOAR. I move it as a separate amendment to the bill to come in at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the first question will be on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia increasing the sum from $35 to $125.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill:

In special recognition of the eminent services to mankind of said Dr. Walter Reed in the discovery of the cause and remedy of yellow fever.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague suggests the words "the means of preventing the transmission and propagation of yellow fever." I think that is an improvement myself.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is better.

Mr. HOAR. I will amend my amendment accordingly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to leave out the word "doctor."

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, the following words:

In special recognition of the eminent service to mankind of said Walter Reed in discovering the cause and method as well as the means of preventing the transmission and propagation of yellow fever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I am sorry to delay the Senate, but that is not exactly read as it was offered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Your colleague changed it.

Mr. HOAR. I want to leave out some words there.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that we proceed with the other bills while the amendment is being prepared.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the remaining pension bills will be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently said: The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the bill, which was passed over, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill:

In special recognition of the eminent services of said Walter Reed in discovering the cause and method as well as the means of preventing the transmission and propagation of yellow fever.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If we are to be critical I want to inquire whether the word "method" there refers to the transmission, or whether it is coupled with the word "cause," and refers to the cause of yellow fever?

Mr. LODGE. I thought the language was clear, "the cause and method, as well as the means of preventing the transmission and propagation of yellow fever."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. It should read "the cause and method of," "in discovering the cause and method of as well as the means of preventing the transmission and propagation of yellow fever."

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts, although I presume to differ with his English very reluctantly, that the repetition of the word "of" is not as good English as he first used.

Mr. LODGE. I put it in to satisfy the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It does not satisfy me.

Mr. LODGE. I wish the Senator from Connecticut would reframe the phrase. What we want to do is to make it clear that we are giving this pension in order to recognize the great services of Dr. Reed in discovering the means and methods by which yellow fever is propagated and transmitted, and also the methods which he discovered of arresting it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is all right. If the Senator would put his amendment in the language which he has just uttered, it would not be open to criticism.

Mr. LODGE. The language of speech is seldom the language of a statute.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not wish to interfere in the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as now modified will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following words:

In special recognition of the eminent services of said Walter Reed in discovering the means of preventing as well as the cause and method of the transmission of the propagation of yellow fever.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

PROPOSED PURE FOOD LEGISLATION.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 3109) for preventing the adulteration, misbranding, and imitation of foods, beverages, candies, drugs, and condiments in the District of Columbia and the Territories, and for regulating interstate traffic therein, and for other purposes, shall be taken up for consideration on Thursday morning after the routine morning business.

Mr. LODGE. If unanimous consent is to be given to take up bills for consideration in the morning hour, if the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] is going to grant requests of that kind, there are one or two bills on the Calendar which I think are more pressing even than the pure-food bill. I should like to know whether the morning hour is going to be granted by the Senator from Pennsylvania for that purpose, because, if so, I have a request to make about the Philippine bill.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, it is within the province and power of the Senator from Massachusetts to object to the consideration of the bill if he chooses. Unanimous consent is asked in this case.

Mr. LODGE. I shall object to the granting of any of these requests until I know whether that is to be general.

Mr. QUAY. I will state for the information of the Senator from Massachusetts it is not going to be general.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him may be taken up for consideration at the completion of the morning business on Thursday. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. I object to the granting of consent at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

HEARING AND DETERMINATION OF ANTITRUST CASES.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6773) to expedite the hearing and determination of suits in equity pending or hereafter brought under the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. QUAY. I will not object, with the understanding that the bill provokes no discussion. If it does, I shall have to withdraw my consent.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, in line 7, page 1, after the word "ninety," to insert "'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, or any other acts having a like purpose that hereafter may be enacted;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in any suit in equity pending or hereafter brought in any circuit court of the United States under the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, or any other acts having a like purpose that hereafter may be enacted, wherein the United States is complainant, the Attorney-General may file with the clerk of such court a certificate that, in his opinion, the case is of general public importance, a copy of which shall be immediately furnished by such clerk to each of the circuit judges of the circuit in which the case is pending. Thereupon such case shall be given precedence over others and in every way expedited, and be assigned for hearing at the earliest practicable day, before not less than three of the circuit judges of said circuit, if there be three or more; and if there be not more than two circuit judges, then before them and such district judge as they may select. In the event the judges sitting in such case shall be divided in opinion, the case shall be certified to the Supreme Court for review in like manner as if taken there by appeal as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That in every suit in equity pending or hereafter brought in any circuit court of the United States under said act, wherein the United States is complainant, including cases submitted but not yet decided, an appeal from the final decree of the circuit court will lie only to the Supreme Court and must be taken within sixty days from the entry thereof: Provided, That in any case where an appeal may have been taken from the final decree of a circuit court to the circuit court of appeals before this act takes effect, the case shall proceed to a final decree therein, and an appeal may be taken from such decree to the Supreme Court in the manner now provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BATE. Is there a report upon this bill?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. There is no report upon it. The bill itself is perfectly plain. It provides, substantially, that whenever the Attorney-General shall certify to the clerk of the circuit court in which a suit in equity under any antitrust laws is pending, or hereafter brought, and wherein the Government is complainant, that the case is of general importance, it shall be the duty of the clerk to furnish a copy of the certificate of the Attorney-General to the circuit judges within the circuit wherein the suit is then pending.

The case shall thereafter be given precedence over other cases and shall be assigned for hearing at the earliest possible date, before not less than three of the circuit judges, and if not more than two circuit judges, then before them and the district judge whom they shall select. An appeal from the final decree of the court shall lie only to the Supreme Court of the United States; and where an appeal might have been taken to the circuit court of appeals before the bill, if enacted into law, takes effect, an appeal may be taken from the final decree therein to the Supreme Court.

The far-reaching importance of the cases arising under antitrust laws now upon the statute books or hereafter to be enacted, and the general public interest therein, are such that every reasonable means should be provided for speeding the litigation. It is the purpose of the bill to expedite litigation of great and general importance. It has no other object.

Mr. BATE. I do not say but that it is all right; I do not know how that is; but I have not myself heard the bill read before. Some others have not, and I think it had better go over until to-morrow.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will allow the bill to be disposed of at this time. There is no objection to it in the Judiciary Committee, and I believe it will meet with the general favor of the Senate.

Mr. BATE. But there is no report from the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is reported from the committee.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The bill is reported from the committee.

Mr. BATE. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It is, I am pleased to say, a unanimous report.

Mr. BATE. There is no objection, then, sir.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to expedite the hearing and determination of suits in equity pending or hereafter brought under the act of July 2, 1890, entitled 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, or any other acts having a like purpose that may be hereafter enacted."

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I desire to renew my request that at 2 o'clock on Thursday, the 19th of February, a final vote be taken upon the pending bill, known as the omnibus statehood bill, with the amendments now pending and those then offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that on the 19th day of February, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, without further debate, the final vote shall be taken upon the pending omnibus statehood bill and amendments then pending and those then offered. Is there objection?

Mr. SPOONER and Mr. NELSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Senator who has charge of this bill for the majority of the Committee on Territories is not in the Chamber, but before he left—and he was obliged to leave—he said to me that he did not anticipate any such request by the Senator from Pennsylvania, in view of the fact that that Senator had made so many unsuccessful efforts to obtain the unanimous consent of the Senate. He thought that he must have learned by this time that it could not be obtained. He asked me, if such a request were made, on his behalf to object to it, and I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. QUAY. I have the floor, I believe, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUAY. I move, in view of what has just been said by the Senator from Wisconsin, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to kindly yield to me until I can call up a bill which is quite important.

Mr. QUAY. I will give way with pleasure to the Senator from North Dakota if the bill provokes no discussion.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not think it will provoke any discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota.

LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12098) to amend section 1 of the act of Congress approved May 14, 1898, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for a right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. This bill——

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill can not be before the Senate until the Senate has consented. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the provisions of the homestead laws of the United States not in conflict with the provisions of this act, and all rights incident thereto, excepting the commutation provisions thereof, and excepting also the provisions relating to the acquisition of title through soldiers' additional homestead rights, are hereby extended to the district of Alaska, subject to such regulations as may be made by the Secretary of the Interior; and no indemnity, deficiency, or lieu lands pertaining to any land grant originating outside of the district of Alaska, and no scrip or warrant of any kind whatsoever shall be located within, taken from, or exercised on any lands in said district: Provided, That no entry shall be allowed extending more than 160 rods along the shore of any navigable water, and along such shore a space of at least 80 rods shall be reserved for entry between all such claims; and that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize entries to be made or title to be acquired to the shore of any navigable waters within said district; and no patent shall issue hereunder until all the requirements of sections 2291, 2292, and 2305 of the Revised Statutes of the United States have been fully complied with as to residence, improvements, cultivation, and proof: And it is further provided, That every person who is qualified to make homestead entry of the public lands of the United States who has settled upon or who shall hereafter settle upon any of the public lands of the United States situated in the district of Alaska, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, with the intention of claiming the same under the homestead laws, shall, subject to the provisions and limitations hereof, be entitled to enter 320 acres or a less quantity of unappropriated public land in said district of Alaska. If any of the land so settled upon, or to be settled upon, is unsurveyed, then the land settled upon, or to be settled upon, must be located in a rectangular form, not more than one mile in length, and located by north and south lines run according to the true meridian; and the location so made shall be marked upon the ground by permanent monuments at each of the four corners of the said location, so that the boundaries of the same may be readily and easily traced; that the record of said location shall, within ninety days from the date of settlement, be filed for record in the recording district in which the land is situated. Said record shall contain the name of the settler, the date of the settlement, and such a description of the land settled upon, by reference to some natural object or permanent monument, as will identify the same; and, if after the expiration of the said period of five years the public surveys of the United States have not been extended over the land located, a patent shall nevertheless issue for the land included within the boundaries of said location as thus recorded, upon proof to be submitted to the register and receiver of the proper land office, upon proof that he is a citizen of the United States, and upon the further proof required by section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and under the procedure in the obtaining of patents to the unsurveyed lands of the United States, as provided for by section 10 of the act hereby amended, and under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior as hereinbefore provided, except that the settler shall pay no price per acre for said land in the procedure of obtaining said patent, except the ordinary office fees and commissions of the register and receiver: And provided always, That no title shall be obtained hereunder to any of the mineral or coal lands of the district of Alaska: And it is further provided, That the right of any homestead settler to transfer any portion of the land so settled upon, as provided by section 2288 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be restricted and limited within the district of Alaska as follows: For church, cemetery, or school purposes to 5 acres, and for the right of railroads across such homestead to 100 feet in width on either side of the center line of said railroad; and all contracts by the settler made before his receipt of patent from the Government, for the conveyance of the land homesteaded by him or her, except as herein provided, shall be held null and void.

Mr. SPOONER. This is a House bill, and the House bill contains six lines. The amendment of the committee is very elaborate, and I should like to have the Senator from North Dakota point out, if he will, the differences between the Senate amendment and the House bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will be very glad to endeavor to do so, if the Senate will bear with me.

Mr. President, the bill passed by the House provided simply for a homestead of 320 acres in Alaska without any other protecting provision.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me? It amended existing law.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It was an amendment.

Mr. LODGE. What is the law to which it referred?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is the one which provided a homestead to the extent of 80 acres, passed some years ago.

Mr. LODGE. Did that act extend the homestead laws to Alaska?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It did. The Committee on Public Lands of the Senate have agreed upon an amendment which we think so thoroughly safeguards the House bill that the committee agreed upon it unanimously, after quite a time being taken in considering it. I think it would be well to have the latter part of the report of the committee read. I send it to the desk, and will ask the Secretary to read all that portion of the report on the second page which is in large type.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Before the reading is entered upon, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to a provision in this bill:

Provided, That no entry shall be allowed extending more than 160 rods along the shore of any navigable water, and along such shore a space of at least 80 rods shall be reserved for entry between all such claims; and that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize entries to be made or title to be acquired to the shore of any navigable waters within said district.

That seems to provide, first, that you may make an entry of 160 rods along the shore of a navigable water; that a space of 80 rods shall be reserved for entry between all such claims; and the next clause is that you shall not acquire any title on navigable waters. I should like an explanation of it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that that is a mistake. I have before me a copy of the bill, in which I have made a correction, and I intended to offer an amendment to insert the word "from" instead of "for."

Mr. SPOONER. In what line?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In line 14, page 2.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The two clauses will then be entirely inconsistent. The one provides that a person may get 160 rods along the shore of navigable waters, 80 rods being reserved between the entries; and the next clause is that he shall not get any title any way to land on navigable waters.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the Senator has misread the bill.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is perfectly plain. Here is this clause:

That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize entries to be made or title to be acquired to the shore of any navigable waters within said district.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me? That is exactly in the words of the present law——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is right.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Intending to reserve the shore line from homestead entry.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. For highway purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. For highway purposes.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Exactly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is in the exact words of the present law.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. By changing the word "for" in line 14 to "from," I think the objection of the Senator from Connecticut will be met.

I will ask that the report may be read as suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That portion of the report which has been marked will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee is fully satisfied of the necessity of extending the homestead law to the district of Alaska in the form presented in the foregoing proposed amendment, and for the following reasons among others:

The present law which allows a homesteader to take 80 acres is entirely inadequate for the conditions of the country and the efforts of those who go there for settlement. A large part of the land in Alaska is suitable for agricultural purposes, but is not suitable for such purposes in the limited area of 160 acres allowed by the general homestead law of the United States, and still less so in an area of 80 acres as allowed by former legislation of Congress.

It is believed by the committee that in enlarging the amount of land which each settler may in good faith take to 320 acres a sufficient amount would be set apart to enable that settler to engage profitably in the occupation of agriculture in that district. The committee has seen fit to increase the limitations of the homestead act, as in the proposed amendment set forth—that is, that the commutation clause of the homestead act, which is applicable to the States of the United States and the Territories, shall not be allowed in Alaska. This is done for the purpose of preventing settlers upon these tracts from taking land for the purpose of speculation and paying $1.25 per acre (as in other parts of the country subject to homestead entry) dispose of their rights and holdings for speculative purposes.

Second. It has been thought proper in cases where a person shall desire to make entry on 320 acres of land as allowed in this bill that he shall make it in a compact, rectangular form not more than 1 mile in length. This precludes the possibility of monopolizing the streams and narrow valleys by any one homesteader.

Third. All this land is, by the operation of this proposed bill, taken out of the operation of the law which allows the entry of land of like character in the United States and Territories by means of the various classes of land scrip which may now be applied to that purpose.

The necessity of legislation of the sort proposed by this bill is pressing and immediate; and, amended as in this report set forth, the committee recommend that the bill be passed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask that the amendment, which I suggested a while ago, in line 14, on page 2, be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 14, page 2, of the amendment strike out the word "for" and insert "from;" so as to read "shall be reserved from entry."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In line 24, on the same page, I propose an amendment. After the word "qualified" I move to insert the words "under existing laws."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "qualified," in line 24, page 2, it is proposed to insert the words "under existing laws;" so as to read:

And it is further provided, That every person who is qualified under existing laws to make homestead entry of the public lands of the United States, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. On page 4, I move to strike out all after the word "provided," in line 10, down to and including the word "patent," in line 12, and to insert "without the payment of any purchase price or other charges."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "provided," in line 10, page 4, it is proposed to strike out "except that the settler shall pay no price per acre for said land in the procedure of obtaining said patent" and to insert "without the payment of any purchase price or other charges;" so as to read:

Without the payment of any purchase price or other charges, except the ordinary office fees and commissions of the register and receiver.

The amendment of the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand the effect of that is to give to the homesteader the land without any payment to the United States, except the ordinary fees for procuring the patent.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The filing fees.

Mr. SPOONER. The filing fees.

Will the Senator kindly explain—there are probably good reasons for it—the enlargement of the homestead privilege to 320 acres. That will be exceptional, as I understand, if this bill becomes a law. What is the reason why a person shall be permitted to homestead 320 acres of land in Alaska while he is not permitted to homestead 320 acres of land elsewhere in the United States?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The opinion of the committee, after fully considering this whole subject-matter, was that it was the duty of Congress to offer as great an inducement as possible to settlers to go to Alaska, and thus, to some extent at least, to endeavor to divert that tremendous stream of emigration which of late years has been pouring over into Canada from the United States. It is well understood that the land laws of Canada are exceedingly liberal. They have been made so in order to induce the immigration to which I have referred. We have a vast territory in Alaska which is reported to us by officials of the Government to be fit for agricultural purposes and stock raising. So the committee reached the conclusion that if a settler went to Alaska, he should have as large a piece of land as possible, so that he might establish not only agriculture but stock raising.

Mr. SPOONER. If he is to have as large a piece of land as possible, why not raise the limit, and say a thousand acres.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think a thousand acres would be altogether too much. At any rate, Mr. President, it was the purpose of the committee to offer an inducement to settlers to go to Alaska and take homesteads; and that was the whole object of increasing the size of the homesteads from 160 acres to 320 acres.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask——

Mr. QUAY. If there is to be any further contention, I shall feel it my duty to object.

Mr. SPOONER. I submit to the Senator from Pennsylvania that it is not a contention. I am only asking a question for information.

Mr. QUAY. Then I will withdraw the word "contention" and say "colloquy."

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota whether this amendment has been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, and whether any report has been made from the Interior Department upon it?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The amendment was not submitted to the Interior Department; but it is strictly in line with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior in his last annual report. The bill is so thoroughly safeguarded in every way that it meets with the approval of all the officials with whom I have talked.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask, if the Senator from Wyoming will permit me, what the Secretary of the Interior thinks in regard to this proposed legislation?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will state just on that point that there is a letter on file in the Committee on Public Lands from the Secretary of the Interior, in which he states that 320 acres of land is not too much for a homestead in Alaska.

Mr. SPOONER. I think that is probably true; and I should like to have that statement in the RECORD.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The bill accords entirely with the view of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the language of the bill, on page 2, beginning in line 7, which reads:

> And no indemnity, deficiency, or lieu lands pertaining to any land grant originating outside of the district of Alaska—

What is meant by the phrase "any land grant originating outside of the district of Alaska?" What is the object of that provision?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That language is inserted with the intention of preventing the location of land scrip that has been issued to the railroad companies; it is intended to prevent them from locating it on any lands in Alaska.

Mr. SPOONER. Does that accomplish the purpose? Of course, a land grant is a grant of land by Congress, but what are referred to as lands originating in the district of Alaska?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. There are no land grants in the district of Alaska. The land grants are those outside of Alaska.

Mr. SPOONER. Would it not be better to provide explicitly that no scrip shall be located?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. We do provide just above against the location of soldiers' additional homesteads.

Mr. SPOONER. Have you not covered the whole ground in this provision:

> And no scrip or warrant of any kind whatsoever shall be located within, taken from, or exercised on any lands in said district.

It occurs to me that the language to which I first called attention is not only unnecessary, but perhaps misleading, and that the object of the committee would be better subserved by omitting it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the Senator is correct about that; and I shall be glad if he will frame an amendment to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, beginning in line 7, page 2, I move to strike out the words:

> And no indemnity, deficiency, or lieu lands pertaining to any land grant originating outside of the district of Alaska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, that amendment should not be agreed to. That clause should remain in the bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have asked the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to perfect an amendment which he proposes to offer instead of the clause in the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I intended to move an amendment that no selections of lieu lands to fill any deficiency in land grants made outside of Alaska shall be permitted in that district.

Mr. NELSON. There is much forest-reserve scrip outstanding. Years ago an act was passed under which the railroads secured lands lying along the mountain sides which were of little value. They relinquished those lands to the Government but preserved the scrip therefor, and they have been using that so-called scrip to secure a great deal of valuable pine land in the Western Territories, in California, in Washington, and in Idaho. The object of this provision is to prevent them using that scrip in Alaska. It is called, in common parlance, "forest-reserve scrip," but it is really no scrip at all.

Mr. SPOONER. If my friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], with whose purpose I am entirely in sympathy, will permit me to call his attention to the language which will remain after my amendment is adopted, I wish to ask him if it does not cover the point he makes? The bill will then read:

> And no scrip or warrant of any kind whatsoever shall be located within, taken from, or exercised on any lands in said district.

That is the language which will remain.

Mr. NELSON. I doubt if that will accomplish the desired object, because though technically this is called "forest-reserve scrip," it is not real scrip. It is simply a matter of the railroad companies having relinquished certain forest-reserve lands to which they were entitled, and they hope to select other lands in lieu of and in satisfaction therefor. This would not come in technically under the form of land scrip. No scrip was issued, as a matter of fact. So, I think the provision in the bill as it stood originally should remain.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the words "originating outside of the district of Alaska" are misleading. I think this clause should be stricken out:

> And no indemnity, deficiency, or lieu lands pertaining to any land grant originating outside of the district of Alaska.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator can see the operation of the bill. Here is the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, which had a land grant extending from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean. As a part of this land grant it had a big mountain out in the State of Washington of little value, but after the forest-reserve law was passed the railroad company relinquished its right to those lands and got the privilege of selecting lieu lands elsewhere, and it has been selling that privilege to lumbermen. I know a lumberman in Minnesota who, under that kind of scrip, has got 700,000 acres of valuable pine land in California. For that reason the object of that amendment is to cut off and prevent the making of such selections.

Mr. SPOONER. And that ought to be cut off. Now, I suggest whether these words would not cover the point:

> And no scrip, forest reserve or otherwise, or land warrant of any kind whatsoever, shall be located within, taken from, or exercised on any lands in said district.

Mr. NELSON. I hardly think it is as broad as the term "lieu lands." That, I think, would come nearer defining it than any other phrase.

Mr. SPOONER. I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that he allow this bill to go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will consent that the bill may go over, Mr. President.

Mr. SPOONER. We are all for the bill, and by that time we can get it into a satisfactory shape, and pass it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

EXTENSION OF EUCLID AVENUE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] consents that I shall ask for the consideration of Senate bill 5909, for the extension of Euclid avenue. I shall withdraw the request if there is any discussion on the bill. I will say that it is important that it should be passed for certain reasons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill the title of which he has stated.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 5909) for the extension of Euclid avenue, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That within thirty days after the passage of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting as a district court, by petition, particularly describing the lands to be taken, a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of Euclid place through lot A of University Park subdivision and lots 14 and 15 of Hall and Elvan's subdivision of Meridian Hill, with a width of 50 feet.

SEC. 2. That of the amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land condemned for the extension of Euclid place as herein provided, not less than one-half thereof shall be assessed by the jury hereinafter provided as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits against those pieces or parcels of land on each side of said Euclid place extended as herein provided, and also on any or all pieces or parcels of land which will be benefited, in the proportion that said jury may find said pieces or parcels of land will be benefited.

SEC. 3. That the proceedings to condemn the land necessary for the extension of Euclid place as herein provided shall be taken under the provisions of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 11 of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the extension of Columbia road east of Thirteenth street, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1900, so far as the same may be applicable to the provisions of this act: Provided, That the amount of money found to be due and awarded as damages as hereinbefore provided shall be payable, one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and a sufficient sum to pay the amount of said awards is hereby appropriated, payable as aforesaid.

SEC. 4. That the sum of $300 is hereby appropriated, one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to provide the necessary funds for the costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSESSMENT ON OIL-MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15198) defining what shall constitute and providing for assessments on oil-mining claims.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that where oil lands are located under the provisions of Title XXXII, chapter 6, Revised Statutes of the United States, as placer-mining claims, the annual assessment labor upon such claims may be done upon any one of a group of claims lying contiguous and owned by the same person or corporation, not exceeding five claims in all, provided that the labor will tend to the development or to determine the oil-bearing character of the contiguous claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE NATIONAL FLORENCE CRITTENTON MISSION.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14899) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Florence Crittenton Mission."

Mr. QUAY. I give notice that I shall object to the consideration of any further bills, but I shall not object to the bill the consideration of which is asked by the Senator from Washington, unless it provokes discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move that the bill (S. 5970) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Florence Crittenton Mission," which is now on the Calendar with a favorable report from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and which is similar to the House bill which has just been passed, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I now ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

INDIAN TERRITORY AND OKLAHOMA.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I had occasion yesterday to consider the omnibus bill with reference to its sins of commission. I propose for a few moments to direct the attention of the Senate to its sins of omission, which are not less heinous.

Some one has said that a blunder may rise to the dignity of a crime, and I submit that the omnibus bill assumes to perpetrate a blunder in legislation the gravity of which can hardly be overstated. I refer to the divorcement of the two sections of the old Indian Territory and the proposition to incorporate the arid end of that Territory into the Union of States and leave the fertile and more productive part thereof entirely unorganized and practically a derelict among the States and Territories. It is too small for another State, too rich in resources to degenerate into a "No Man's Land." The proposition is to leave it in its present pitiable and chaotic condition, "without form and void," without relief or hope.

Protest has been made upon the floor against the intolerable eastern boundary of the present Territory of Oklahoma as recognized by this bill. It seems to have been cut down with a dull knife. It has jagged and irregular angles, and is not only unscientific, but absolutely intolerable. This is not a sentimental objection, but it is one of substance, because I need only remind you, sir, that if that is to remain as a permanent boundary, marked by no natural object like lake or river, but an imaginary line running zigzag across that eastern frontier, there will be constant questions of jurisdiction arising, and we will confer upon Oklahoma an unwelcome heritage of law suits. Besides that, sir, we might be responsible for a generation of cross-eyed children should they undertake to follow the boundary of the State in which they live.

As has been well said, the geographical argument was never stronger than it is in this case for a reunion of the two sections of the old Indian Territory. It is familiar that the present Territory of Oklahoma, while it is rich in agriculture, has no timber that is fit for any commercial use, it has no minerals, while the Indian Territory is well watered and has abundant timber. It has an inexhaustible supply of coal, most easily reached by man, some of the coal measures being within 6 feet of the surface and requiring only what is known as the stripping process to allow access to them. In addition to that, sir, the Indian Territory has iron, lead, zinc, and building stone of many varieties. It has splendid sandstone; it has as good an article of granite as is yielded by any quarry in America; it has marble, and in addition to that, an abundant supply of asphaltum and unmistakable indications of oil.

I presume, sir, that for the most part the Indian Territory to our people is an unknown land. It was so to me, and I shared the general superstition regarding it until a visit of the Committee on Indian Affairs made it possible for me to discover the popular error. It is, sir, a great garden spot, and I can hardly better explain its wonderful resources than by saying that under its genial sky the three great staples, corn, wheat, and cotton, are grown with equal success. So that, instead of the divorcement of these two sections, if they are brought together, as nature evidently intended they should be, there will be the resources of a great, rich, powerful State. They can manufacture their cotton, having the coal at hand and having cheap labor, at a lower price than it can be manufactured anywhere else in the world.

The railroads, anticipating the growth of that fertile region, have already gridironed the Territory with lines of communication far in excess of what has taken place in many of the older States.

I wish to say a word also, Mr. President, regarding the so-called Indians who for seventy years have held that vast tract of land by a communal title. I expected, in going into that region, to see the traditional tepee, to see Indians in blankets and with painted faces, but I soon learned that those tribes of Indians became civilized before they left the Southern States in 1835, and that the bleaching process, to which reference has been made, began at that early day. Those Indians are an intelligent people. The young men are active and industrious. Many of them are wealthy; a large proportion of them are as white as we, and as active and energetic. They have accumulated property. It is true that the full-bloods, who have retreated into the flint hills, live there by themselves and are not at all progressive, but they number only about 8,000, and are speedily passing away.

It is understood, I presume, that these Five Civilized Tribes, as they are justly called, under the act of Congress having the fee simple of that vast tract of territory conferred upon them as a tribe, had also the power to enforce a complete isolation. No white man could enter that Territory, under the act of Congress, without becoming an intruder.

But, Mr. President, those Indians were bright enough and broad enough to see that if they invited the white man to come in they would have better stores, better physicians, better lawyers; that the farms would be cultivated with better thrift and success, and so they broke down the barriers that this Government had extended around them for their protectien, changed their policies, and invited the white men to come. And they have come, Mr. President, in large numbers. I believe there are today, in the Indian Territory, no less than 400,000 white men. While there I had an opportunity to become acquainted with a large number of those people.

I had the honor of addressing many audiences. I saw many of them in their homes and in their places of business. I visited their thrifty cities, where were exhibited stocks of goods as large as in an ordinary store in our cities in the North, and I want to say, sir, that it would be hard to exaggerate the intelligence, the thrift, the enterprise that everywhere permeate those communities. There is no friction whatever between the Indian population and the white population. They are working in harmony, but of course the Indians have taken care of the subject of education for their own children, and at Tahlequah, the capital of the Cherokee Nation, I saw as fine a building as one often finds dedicated to the purposes of education, a building which must have cost from $75,000 to $100,000. It was an Indian school for girls, and was well regulated in every way. So each of the tribes has provided, from its own fund, facilities for the education of the Indian children.

Mr. President, it was simply refreshing to go into those communities and see the enthusiasm and enterprise of the people. When they make known their wishes here regarding the future of that country I feel that they are entitled to the considerate attention of Congress.

I wish to direct the attention of the Senate for a moment to another objection that has not been alluded to in debate, which I think is a fair criticism of the omnibus bill. The proposition to confer statehood upon Oklahoma alone would, I apprehend, create an intolerable burden upon the people there. If any Senator will examine the map of this proposed State he will find in the northeastern corner thereof a very large domain which belongs to the Osage Indians. I can not give the Senate at this moment the exact dimensions of it, but it is a very large tract, which, of course, would not belong to the taxable area of the new State. If you turn to the southwestern part of the proposed State you will find another very large area known as the "Kiowa and Apache Reservation." While it is proposed to open up and allot that land in the near future, I would call the attention of the Senate to the fact that for a series of years, varying from five to seven, according to the pleasure of the homesteader, this great section would not be liable to contribute anything to the burdens of taxation.

It is true, sir, that for a time certain sections of the Indian Territory will not be available for purposes of revenue, but the two Territories taken together will be able at once to sustain all the burdens of statehood and to administer a republican form of government beyond the possibility of doubt.

Let me call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the situation in the Indian Territory as throwing light upon the character of the white people who have settled there. It may not be generally known, but it is none the less true, that in the Indian Territory they have been practically without law. The Five Tribes administered their own laws. They had their own executive, their own legislature, their own judiciary; but gradually that tribal government has crumbled away.

The United States has dismantled the tribal courts and substituted Territorial courts of its own, and so little by little and year by year the tribal government in all its departments has faded out. We have from time to time imported from Arkansas certain sections of Mansfield's Digest, but they have none of the ordinary adjuncts of government. They have no towns, they have no counties, they have no machinery for laying out roads, for building jails; they have no provisions for the unfortunate, the insane, or the defective classes, and they have had scarcely any system of law that could be called domestic in its character.

Now, I call attention to the fact that during all these years the white population in that Territory has been self-governing, and I think it is a great tribute to the genius of the American people for self-government that that community down there has made such a record under such adverse circumstances. The facts will show, sir, that notwithstanding the anomalous and chaotic conditions, so far as law and local institutions are concerned, there has been less crime in the Indian Territory than has occurred in either of the neighboring States. It shows that those people were so imbued with the American idea of self-government that they became independent and capable of controlling their own affairs, guided only by the American instincts that had been implanted in their breasts in the States whence they came.

But in this connection I beg to say thatthe condition of affairs in the Indian Territory is pitiable in the extreme, and an acquaintance with that state of affairs ought to be the strongest argument here for including the Indian Territory with Oklahoma, if either is to be admitted. There are there in that Territory about 50,000 white children of school age, with no system of schools at all. It is barbarous that anywhere within our domain, no matter how remote it may be, such a state of things should continue. Those children down there have been memorializing this body by sending postal cards here, a bundle of which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] exhibited one day upon the floor. He handed me that little bundle of postal cards, and my eye fell upon the uppermost card, which was written by a little girl, and it said: "The state of things down here is awful:" and the little girl spelled the word "awful" "o-f-f-a-l." Now, that child little understood what pathos she was unconsciously adding to her appeal.

No, Mr. President, the conscience of the United States Senate ought to be aroused by such a state of things, and we ought, if we are to do justice to those people, to remedy the existing state of affairs as soon as we are able.

Another thing, Mr. President, the people of both those sections of the old Indian Territory are desirous of single statehood. This desire has been manifested in many ways, by hundreds of letters received by all of us who have had any connection with the affairs of that Territory; by committees who have appeared here; by numerous conventions held in both these Territories, and notably by the great convention held on the 6th day of January last, attended by 5,000 delegates from both Territories, where the resolution for single statehood was unanimously adopted.

Why should the wishes of those people be frustrated? Why should we, sitting here, assume to impute to them ignorance in regard to local conditions bearing on the question of statehood? They know what the situation is in the Indian Territory far better than we do. If it be their desire, as clearly appears also by the evidence taken by the subcommittee, that they should remain together as one great State—a State in which they and their children after them may feel just pride—should we sit here and arbitrarily ignore their request?

There is another thing, Mr. President. I believe that the people in both Oklahoma and Indian Territory have vindicated their plea for statehood by the wonderful progress that has been made there in the last thirteen years. Thirteen years ago what is now Oklahoma Territory was like a wilderness, but like a young giant that Territory has pushed to the front, while New Mexico and Arizona have proceeded with laggard steps. They have established a civilization there that is marvelous. Their progress excels anything of the kind that has ever marked the history of this commonwealth.

It is also worthy of remark that these people have tolerated no saloons and no gambling houses. The spirit of the people, unaided by law, was in favor of peace and order and good morals. In this substantial way they have commended themselves to our approbation. Let us listen to their powerful appeal.

Now, Mr. President, in view of the situation there, in view of the wishes of the people, I submit whether we ought to burden those people with the enormous expense of two State establishments for all time. Just consider for a moment what an intolerable burden that will be when, as they say, and as everybody must know, one State government would accomplish the desired end. We ought not to impose upon them such a burden as that.

I will not stop now to calculate in dollars and cents what an enormous sum that would amount to as the years roll on, but, encumbered as they both are, for the time being, with local conditions which will restrict the taxing area, I submit they should be combined in one State, so that they may with dignity and ease, as well as with honor, maintain a republican form of government. They have richly earned all that they ask, and are to be commended for desiring a single State that may have varied resources, insuring wealth and power, and calculated to fulfill the aspirations of a proud, high-spirited people.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], when making his interesting address, spoke about the absence of a school fund in the Indian Territory. I agree, in a large measure, with what he said. I think myself it would be unfair to require Oklahoma to merge herself with the Indian Territory unless some provision be made to equalize the abundant provision already made for education in the Territory of Oklahoma. This objection may be readily met. When the process of allotment is completed in the Indian Territory there will be considerable fractions of land in each tribal domain which will not be needed for purposes of allotment, and I believe that when the time comes the Government of the United States should buy all of those fractions and portions of land and incorporate them into a suitable school fund, in order that the Indian Territory may be suitably endowed to enter into the Union with Oklahoma on a fair basis.

Now, Mr. President, I have about concluded what I wished to say, and I have spoken already much longer than I intended. But there have been some very peculiar manifestations since this bill came to us from the House. I think there are not lacking indications that the old omnibus had made several trips before it came here; that it has stood before the doors of every national convention held for many years; that, like St. Paul, or following his advice, it has been "all things to all men." Finally the old omnibus was pulled from the other end of the Capitol in here and occupied the middle aisle between the two sides of the Chamber, and I fancy that on the other side of the old vehicle there was a legend, "This is a Democratic band wagon," whereas on this side it bore the legend of the Philadelphia convention, with the suggestion below, "What is politics among friends?"

Some of the Senators from this side of the Chamber, forgetting the story of the Trojan horse and forgetting, for the time being, that memorable line of Virgil, "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes," have volunteered to be harnessed up with the Democrats to help pull the omnibus through the Senate. Shortly after the old vehicle came in, the astute Senator from Pennsylvania, a most consummate master and strategist in politics, mounted the box, and, turning that classic and immobile face toward us; that face that never betrays the secrets of the busy brain behind it—you might as well study the face of the Sphinx to learn the secrets of the desert—says to us, "Senators, I call for the regular order. Any of you who undertake to remove the old omnibus out of its place must be considered an obstructionist. This omnibus is a triumphal car which is on its way to the White House, and let us have the regular order now, and no obstruction." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, if the old omnibus shall ever reach that historic place toward which it seems to be destined, I think it will pass into history as the greatest political paradox of modern times. Now, instead of taking that lumbering old vehicle down to the White House, I would suggest in conclusion that it be retired to some appropriate place, there to be kept, like the coach of Washington, as a curiosity, or perhaps better yet, like the chariot of Maximilian, still cherished by the people of Mexico as an instructive relic, an unholy ambition.

Mr. KEAN addressed the Senate. After having spoken for a few minutes,

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was listening very attentively to what the Senator said, but I did not catch, from the numbers assigned to each county, whether the Senator was going over the question of apportionment, as the committee has done in the report with reference to Arizona. Was that what the Senator was doing? I could not quite catch it over here.

Mr. KEAN. That is what the Senator from New Jersey was attempting to do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator from New Jersey was attempting to do it, he was doing it extremely well, as he does everything he attempts to do.

Mr. KEAN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have not myself given careful attention to the New Mexican apportionment. I did to the Arizona apportionment, which deserves considerable attention here from somebody by way of explanation, and for which explanation the committee has called, but which nobody has given as yet.

There is a disparity of representation in the constitutional convention, as represented by its constituencies, which, on the face of it, is simply outrageously unjust, as will be seen by referring to the page perhaps preceding the last page of the committee's report. A county will be given, let us say, for example, three representatives, and another county, having twice the population, is given practically the same number of representatives. Yet that radical injustice and the denial of popular representation in the constitutional convention is deliberately inserted in this bill. Now, if that be also true with reference to New Mexico, it renders the iniquity of the bill, of course, all the greater.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not familiar with this provision of the bill, but I want to suggest that in one New England State every city and town is alike represented. A city of 25,000 has the same representation in the legislature as a town of a hundred. In another New England State the representation is almost as unequal. It seems to me that if there is a little inequality in New Mexico or Arizona it is not so startling as it is in some of the older States of the American Union. But this is not a gerrymander, but inequality of representation, which exists in almost every State.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator from New Jersey will permit me——

Mr. KEAN. I was merely going to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that those States in New England started well, and they did have equal representation when they started.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

Mr. KEAN. They have not changed their system. It is the system they adhere to, and they do well, in my opinion, when they adhere to old customs and old notions.

Mr. GALLINGER. That of course is the Senator's opinion. I will say that they did not start in accordance with the principle of equality at all, nor have they adhered to the principle of equality. I am not criticising the situation, but I think there is a great deal of denunciation heaped upon these Territories in matters concerning which they are doing quite as well as some of the older States of this Union.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. With the permission of the Senator from New Jersey, I should like to say a word.

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I hope I do not understand my friend the honorable Senator from New Hampshire to defend a gerrymander upon the instances that he has stated from New England. It is a gerrymander to which we refer in the apportionment of the constitutional convention for Arizona. It is a gerrymander, I take it, to which the Senator from New Jersey refers when he alludes to the apportionment in New Mexico. The Senator from New Hampshire comes back and says in certain New England States they started out with equality representation by towns. The Senator does not intend to defend this gerrymander by that historical instance?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to remark that the question of gerrymander is one from which no State is entirely free. The State of Indiana has been guilty of gerrymandering. I presume the Senator from Indiana has lifted his voice against it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, the Senator has gone further than most men in public life in the direction of political virtue.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Do I understand that the Senator from New Hampshire would not lift his voice against it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators must not indulge in this conversation. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Presiding Officer. I will occupy the floor but a moment, by the courtesy of the Senator from New Jersey.

I was about to say that there is scarcely a State in the North which has not been guilty of gerrymandering to gain advantage in the legislature, to gain advantage in Congressional representation, and to accomplish political purposes. As to how far these two Territories have been guilty in that direction, I do not know. No evidence has been produced that they have done it at all. But I venture to say they have not gone beyond the point that happens almost every year in the States of the North, and I think we ought not to hold them in terrorem because they have possibly imitated the conduct of the people in Indiana, in New Jersey, and in New Hampshire. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I do not know what is the Senator's familiarity with the history of gerrymandering in Indiana, although he speaks with a great deal of liberality concerning that subject. I do know something about that history, and the Senator was quite right when he said that perhaps I had lifted my voice against it. I have lifted my voice against it, and always intend to do so; and while I claim no monopoly, no more than the ordinary share of political virtue, no more than that which ought to actuate every citizen, it is my purpose to lift my voice against such a thing as that in my own or any other State with which I have anything to do, whether it is attempted by the opposition party or by my own party. I do not think that substantial and permanent victory comes by any such political trick, and I see no reason why, without the assumption of extraordinary virtue, a man should not "lift his voice," to use the Senator's expression, against that denial of popular representation wherever it may occur.

But that is not the question here. It is not the question whether Arizona is imitating bad examples set somewhere else, either in the Mississippi Valley or New England. It is the question whether the Congress of the United States shall imitate that example, because this gerrymander appears in this bill, in the enabling act which is to constitute these present Territories States. It is not their act. They are not following the bad example of other States or parties in other States. It is our act. And does the Senator or any other Senator mean to say that it is admissible, or even pardonable, that the Congress of the United States should follow a reprehensible example simply because it has been done by some or either political party in any State in a political emergency?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——
Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.
Mr. GALLINGER. I mean to say that in almost every State in the American Union at the present time gerrymanders exist in reference to Congressional districts, which the Congress of the United States, under the Constitution, could correct if it chose to do so. I think I am not mistaken in the assertion that the Congressional districts of the State of Indiana have been gerrymandered, and that the lines are not now laid down in accordance with the principle of equality. That is my judgment, and I am somewhat familiar with the question, too, Mr. President.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the judgment of the Senator as to political lines in Indiana may well be put up against the combined judgment of men who the Senator himself will admit are patriotic and fairly intelligent and who really know something about the subject. But that begs the question I asked the Senator and the Senate, and that question is, conceding it to be true, as we know it is, that perhaps all parties in the past have resorted to this trick of temporary partisan advantage (a thing which to my observation has never resulted in their permanent advantage), does the Senator mean to say that the Senate of the United States in conferring statehood on a Territory, in calling her constitutional convention, should deliberately and with her eyes open, imitate that bad example; and that we do it deliberately and with our eyes open is exhibited on the face of the bill itself?

This gerrymander is not a thing to be implied or inferred. It is on the written pages which it is proposed we shall enact. Is there anybody here, no matter how ardent an advocate he is of the statehood measure, who will defend that principle? Will anybody maintain that the Senate of the United States has come to the point where it ought to follow admittedly the worst practices of political parties for temporary advantage?

Mr. President, the Senator, in his remarks a moment ago, seemed to admit the gerrymander, and he said something about its being for partisan purposes. I have not mentioned for what purpose it was; the committee in its report did not mention for what purpose it was; and the Senator has been the first to suggest any partisan purpose with reference to this subject, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know that the Senator from Indiana does not mean to misrepresent me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not, and will not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I said that gerrymanders had occurred in the States for partisan purposes, and the Senator knows it to be true.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly I know it to be true; and that being true, I ask the Senator whether or not he indorses it and thinks the Senate of the United States ought to follow that bad practice in this bill. In the committee's report and in the debates upon this subject we have not charged that the figures exhibited there are a gerrymander for political purposes. Every Senator upon this floor and every member of the Senate who has studied the subject no doubt knows in his own mind what they are for. But the committee did, in its report, call upon those who are urging the passage of the omnibus bill to explain those figures; and although the bill has been before the Senate since the opening of the session, not one Senator who is in favor of it has uttered a syllable in explanation of this feature. Is that not strange?

Now, Mr. President, let me read just what it is in reference to Arizona, and then I want to hear further from the Senator from New Jersey with reference to the gerrymander in New Mexico, which had escaped my attention, I will say.

In Arizona Apache County has 2 delegates and 8,297 population. I will not read them all but will go along——

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish the Senator would read them all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. All right. Cochise County has 4 delegates and 9,251 population. That is practically the proportion. Coconino 2 delegates, with 5,514 population; Gila, 2 delegates and 4,973 population. Now listen. Graham 3 delegates, with a population of 14,162; Maricopa 5 delegates, with a population of 20,457; Mohave 2, with a population of 3,426. Mohave County has 2 for a population of 3,426, whereas Graham has 3 for a population of 14,162. Navajo has 2, with a population of 8,829, although Mohave, with only 3,426 has 2; that is to say, one county, with twice the population, has the same representation as another county which has only half the population. Will any Senator explain that? Is that a thing which any Senator wants to put upon the statute book of the United States? Pima County has 3 delegates, with a population of 14,689, and Pinal has 3 with less than half of that number, namely, 7,779.

Why is it, I ask the Senator or any other Senator, that the people of Pinal County should be given twice the representation in the constitutional convention that the people of Pima County have? That is what they have. Each of those counties has 3 delegates in the constitutional convention, yet one county has twice the population of the other.

That thing runs all through. Santa Cruz has 2 delegates, with a population of 4,545. Listen to that. Yet Navajo County has only 2, with 8,829. Why is it that the people of Navajo County are denied 50 per cent of their representation? Why is it that the people of Santa Cruz are given 2 representatives whereas Navajo has but 2, with twice the population?

Yavapai has 4 for 13,799 population. Yuma has 2 for 4,145.

There, Mr. President, is the apportionment on the face of the bill itself, which it is proposed, without correction and even without explanation, to enact into law.

There have been only two vigorous defenses of this measure, and yet although the committee's report calls for an explanation of that from anybody favoring the bill, not one word has been heard of it. I should like to have some explanation, and if no explanation can be given, are the Senators willing to correct that apportionment? Will anybody say that an explanation should not be given when we are conferring statehood and are deliberately denying to the people in the proposed new State a proportionate representation in their constitutional convention? Does anybody think it is beneath his notice to explain that thing? Is it consistent with republican form of government? Is it consistent with the principle of democratic representation?

Therefore, Mr. President, I rose to ask the Senator from New Jersey to explain more fully the New Mexican apportionment, which had escaped my attention.

Mr. McCOMAS. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me for a while?

Mr. KEAN. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. President, I have been listening to this debate in respect of this very unhappy feature—the gerrymandering of the legislative districts—as a beginning of statehood in the new States. The proposition is that the Congress of the United States must now crystallize these gerrymanders, the worst practice and the most insidious danger to representative government in the organic acts of these new States. The great misfortune of this debate, and I think a consideration which has much prolonged the debate, is that there has been no opportunity, and there will be given no opportunity, to better the bill, to take out of it features which are admittedly objectionable, features which even those who are the most earnest advocates of the passage of the measure must realize are serious objections in the making of new States.

It happens that we are not permitted to make amendment. We must either reject the bill or we must accept it with these objectionable provisions in it. For one, I object to that method of legislation upon any proposition. I object to it when it is to inaugurate the organic laws of States. I object to it when it is to divide the sovereign power of this Federal Republic, not among 45 but among 48 States. You are going to make a large subdivision of the sovereign power of the States, and you are going to base this action of Congress now upon an error fundamental, starting with legislative districts so unequally divided in these States, not only in the election of Representatives in Congress, but in the election of representatives to the legislature who elect Senators in Congress.

It is said here that if it be thus in Arizona, it is likewise in New Mexico. That is a double reason why the whole matter should stop here and now. If it happens that Republicans in New Mexico have gerrymandered that Territory, and that the Democrats have gerrymandered the Territory of Arizona, then "a plague o' both your houses." If we are to make them States and if they are to enter the great circle of sovereign powers under a Federal Union, they should come with clean hands; they should not ask in this beginning of the twentieth century that that despicable, narrow little trick of gerrrymandering should be sanctioned by Congress.

I speak with some feeling upon this matter. I never had any part in making any gerrymander of any State, and, except in recent years, I have had no opportunity to attempt a gerrymander. I am proud to say that when, after a long series of years of political adversity in my State, the time came when the Republicans could make Representative districts in any extent whatever, in the only instance in which they did it the Republicans made them so fair, so just, so reasonable, that the opposition party, expecting to find that we were trying to intrench ourselves by that petty trickery, were astonished at our moderation, and by their silence approved our justice and wisdom.

Years ago, Mr. President, in the House of Representatives, I had the honor to introduce—and I remember it went as far as the approval of the caucus of my party in that House—after as much study as I was capable of and with such seriousness as I could bring to the proposition, I framed a bill to prevent this practice of gerrymandering the Congressional districts. The purpose was to so have it apply in the legislation of Congress that it might be an example to the people of the States and to the legislatures in respect of their legislative districts.

There will come a time, Mr. President, when the fountain of representative power will be cleansed of this contamination, and an awakened sentiment of the people of the country will tend to purge it more and more. After the excitement of the elections and the stress of party ascendency, the zeal of party manipulation will at some time in this great country of ours give place to a serious and thoughtful effort to stop this practice of gerrymandering; and that effort will receive the impetus and encouragement of the better thought in this country.

Yet now, in the beginning of the twentieth century, we are in haste and anxiety to bring in new States which might wait for a little more population and might make more equitable division of the scant population in their legislative districts in two of the proposed new States which this bill proposes to admit forever. They should not imitate the inequality of the rainfall in those arid regions by fixing a like inequality in the population of the legislative districts.

We certainly have a right to make those amendments, and we should be permitted to make them. I hope that Senators who are urgently in favor of this bill will agree, if ever this matter shall be adjusted after long debate, that we shall have the opportunity to make such improvements in respect of these matters. They are fundamental; they are essential; and I, for one, would never be prepared to vote for any bill which would enact into law, not the current law of an appropriation bill, which every year may be changed, not a statute of general law, which may be modified or amended, but an organic law, an act which makes a State, which we can not change after it passes unamended. It should not be, and I thought it could not be, in the Senate of the United States until I saw this omnibus bill to rush new States into the Union in this ill-advised fashion.

The more this bill is examined, Mr. President, the more the friends of it must be seriously concerned that it is not a better bill, and the more those who think it is not a good bill should go over it and give it more careful consideration.

Why can we not amend this bill? Why can we not wipe out the Republican gerrymander in one of the new States and the Democratic gerrymander in another of the new States? I look in vain for some one to give a good reason why it should not be done.

In the bill against gerrymandering which I framed and had reported years ago in the other House, and which died in the midst of more exciting things, in addition to equality in population a Territory was required to be compact, contiguous, adjacent, and, as nearly as possible, symmetrical in its geographic boundaries. Those are elements which do not apply to this gerrymander on the face of it, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] has so well said in his interesting speech, and as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] has so admirably stated from the table contained in his own most persuasive report upon this bill, the report of the majority.

Mr. President, if we could have a new chart on these walls of the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, with the gerrymander and the shading in the density of population as we have in the tabulation of the census, it would show a most glaring and unequal picture of the popular legislative representation in that country.

How few are these people? A limited number of people, 1 man to 1 square mile of territory in a domain larger than New York and New England combined, and we are asked to hasten, despite this inequality in a sparse country, where population would seem to be almost too scarce to tempt anyone to a gerrymander, to ratify and confirm this most glaring inequality by passing this statehood bill.

I remember to have made—some years ago, and I am sorry that I have it not here—some tabulations and to have placed in the report upon that antigerrymander bill a number of maps of most curious gerrymanders in this country. When we came to make a new apportionment bill last year, after the last census, we required that the territory should be compact and contiguous in the Congressional districts. In doing that we made a slight advance. It was not compulsory, but was persuasive as against the habit of Congressional gerrymandering.

Shall it be, Mr. President, that the Senate is powerless now; that it must incontinently rush into the circle of States these ill-prepared Territories with their sparse populations, their unattractive aspect, and without any prospect of their increase in population and wealth within many decades? It is said this must be done—done now, done within the next thirty days—without getting rid of this bad feature in this organic law.

There is another reason why the feature of the gerrymander which we are thus to sanction and to dignify by the action of the Senate is particularly unfortunate. From the very interesting speech of the Senator from California [Mr. BARD], and from the observations of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM], whose thorough and comprehensive speech I have just been reading in the RECORD, it appears that there is a considerable population in New Mexico and Arizona with which we have heretofore had much to do—a Mormon population. I speak of it not economically, but I speak of it in respect of citizenship. There is not a more hardy, industrious, pertinacious people anywhere than the Mormon community. In the orderly and daily conduct of life, in thrift, in industry, in frugality, in sobriety, they are a most remarkable people.

If any community, if men of any sect or creed, can be said to be fitted to fight that area of desert to find water, and to make the country blossom and bloom where water was not accessible before their immigration, they are the people who can conquer the obstacles of the desert and the arid region. They have subarid regions, and in some places they approach the arid region, according to our geological description of our vast country, which is lacking in copious and abundant rainfall. They have in a measure solved this irrigation problem. They are now moving farther south into New Mexico, and especially into Arizona.

It has been here stated repeatedly, and denied by nobody, that one-fifth of the political power in Arizona is in the hands of the Mormon people who have emigrated thither. It is more than one-fifth. There is not in respect of the Mormons the uniform slowness of increase of population in that Territory—a slowness of population which is quite unusual and quite un-American. The Mormons alone keep up about the American average of increase of their own people in that Territory.

In Oklahoma the other people of the United States not of the Mormon faith vastly exceed the Mormons in number. Oklahoma is in a latitude different from that of Arizona or New Mexico. It is among the choicest regions of the temperate zone. It is being populated from both North and South, and not by the Mormons.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana will address the Chair.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Indiana. The objection of the Chair was to the Senator turning his back on the Chair.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, Mr. President, I was talking to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], and, however much it may be necessary, the Chair well knows that I always address the Chair in intent.

I, however, desire to interrupt the Senator from Maryland for the purpose of asking him a question of considerable concern to the Senate and, I take it, to this country. In the matters with which my time has been occupied I have not noticed it until this moment, and I ask the Senator from Maryland, and if he can not answer me, then I ask the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] or the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] or any other Senator in favor of this bill, as to whether there is an antipolygamy clause in this bill with reference to Arizona.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand there is.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, Mr. President, the committee in drafting its substitute put that clause in with great care. I do not know whether it is in this bill or whether it is not in this bill, but it is something I desire very much to know. It is very pertinent to the subject about which the Senator from Maryland is now speaking.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I was just about to refer to that feature of this bill.
